Hours succeeded to hours; the day passed and evening came, and with the evening the priest, or Imaum, and the ceremony began. The priest was seated upon a carpet spread upon the ground outside the door of the house between two of his accolytes. When the moment was come, and all was ready, the priest changed the sitting posture for the kneeling, invoked the blessing of Allah, and replaced himself in his first attitude. The bridegroom then appeared, handing a young boy of some ten years old who carried a sort of black paste upon a plate, and headed it to the priest, who put the plate upon the carpet at his side, took a bit of the paste, which I learned afterwards to be the kewe, and rolled it in his fingers till he made a ball of it, murmuring all the while some sort of incantation. He then took the hand of the bridegroom, who, with his extraordinary mate, knelt before him, and shut it, as if he wished to show him how to box, but his intentions were of a much more pacific nature. Keeping the ball of paste on the top of his fore-finger, he introduced it into the hand of the young man, and leaving in it the greater sort of the paste, he took out a large quantity, spread it over the orifice of the hole formed by the bended fingers; and inclining the thumb upon it, he sealed the whole hand, and seemed satisfied with the result. But fearing, I suppose, that some unlooked for circumstance should destroy this capital work, he rolled a handkerchief many times round the closed hand of the bridegroom, and did not leave till he had ascertained that to unloose it would not be the affair of an instant. The same operation was accomplished upon the head of the little boy; after which, they both rose up and were married, or at least one of them was married, not to the other, but to a poor girl, who had taken no part whatever in the ceremony. What was she doing during this time? Nothing but what she done from the begining of that memorable day—crying, and I really felt a great deal of compassion for the poor creature. Other people, however, were better occupied in the interior of the balamut. A young girl of twelve, and a boy about the same age were preparing the couch for the new couple—kneeling, courtseying and singing at every [illegible] gesture. American Paper.

On board Government Schooner "Lark," at sea.
February, 23rd. 1853.

Mr. Editor:—Returning from Sinoe, where we held our Association, I relieve the tediousness of the hour in penning some of what I saw and heard, and the reflections which they excited. Perhaps I may as well say, that my stay at Sinoe was shorter by some days than I had determined on. I left Monrovia on Monday, expecting to reach my destination on Tuesday or Wednesday morning, which would have given me some little time to look around, and make acquaintances, before the opening of the session. On Tuesday, when near the river's mouth, a squall came off the land, and on Wednesday morning, we found ourselves off "Nanny Kroo;" thence, the winds and waves being contrary, we were until Saturday morning beating back to Sinoe. On Friday afternoon we sent a canoe on shore, when, Mr. Minus of the Brig Freting, of Hamburg, with his accustomed prompt kindness, sent his boat and took the ladies ashore. The land breeze springing up about 4 o'clock in the morning, we made sail, and at seven anchored in the mouth of the river.

We were soon ashore; found the wharf crowded with Sinoites, each loud with cordial greetings and pressing invitations to "stay at my house." There being more Sinoites than Monrovians, it was clear, we could not stay at every house; so to dispose of the matter, we agreed to leave the whole arrangement to the brethren. Having doffed our sea dudds and donned the landsman's, we proceeded to look around. The hour of meeting arrived. We repaired thither. Rev. Richardson preached a short discourse: after which, we proceeded to business. From this time, as each one put on his individuality and acted for himself, we will be permitted to drop the social we, and employ the egotistic I.

When the session opened, I found that most of the business contemplated had been dispatched. The introductory sermon had been preached—the circular read and adopted, and most of the unfinished business of the last Association had been called up and disposed of. I had in mind many things to bring before the brethren, but the shortness of the time and a severe attack of neuralgia threatened to prevent my doing any thing. At the afternoon's session some interesting questions came up, and were discussed with great earnestness and animation. They were important questions, intimately connected with the vital interest of our denomination, as subordinate to the wider extension of simple Bible religion. The debates were kept up to a late hour, when it was agreed to protract the session to Monday—to which time the further consideration of the subjects was referred.

On Monday the subjects of Saturday's debate were resumed. As is usual on such occasions, there was a diversity of opinions; a diversity it is pleasing to state, not in regard to the magnitude or importance of the objects, but to the best method of securing them. And it is pleasing to state further, that at no former meeting of the representation of our churches have objects of so great magnitude been so fully, pointedly, and animatedly discussed, whilst so kindly and cordial a feeling prevailed.

The subjects were the duty of delegates to endeavor to awaken the churches to a practical recognition of their covenant obligations, and thus prepare them for a direct recognition of their obligations to the heathen around them.

These subjects settled, the remaining business was disposed of. The Moderator then gave out the hymn commencing,

"Blest be the ties that binds &c."

After singing and prayer, the Association adjourned to meet at Marshall, on the second Thursday in December next. I should have mentioned that it was determined that a discourse should be delivered to the ministers. This arduous service was imposed upon me. Ever thankful for expressions of regard & confidence, this present one, was an exception. Unprepared at best, for so high and important a duty, I was rendered more especially so, by a severe attack of Neuralgia, from which I had not had an hour's respite, since I landed at Sinoe. With that state of mind, which those only, who have been placed in like circumstances, can conceive, I ascended the pulpit of the Methodist Church, which had been tendered for the occasion, and proceeded—possibly to say many things, which, were they now to rise up before me, a manly pride would render me quite willing that they should be forgotten by me, and all who heard me.

Rev. Mr. Priest of the Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Mr. Wilson of the M. E. Church, kindly tendered their houses of worship for the use of the Association, as the Baptists' house of worship is unfinished. As the Bishop was hourly expected, and his arrival might probably interrupt the business of the Association, Mr. Priest's offer was accepted—yet our preachers filled the desk of the Methodist Church twice on Saturday and twice on Sabbath.

The influence of this Association, will, I have no doubt be long felt, and beneficially felt upon our churches, and upon religion generally in this Republic. A spirit of inquiry has been awakened, which will not be repressed until it has led to a more clear and practical recognition of duty; a sentiment of self-respect has been engendered, which will not be satisfied with entire dependence upon others, but will seek for satisfaction in its own achievements—while an exhibition has been made of the strength and capabilities of the denomination to carry out these achievements. I will not, I trust be anticipating the minutes, which will shortly appear, if I put down here the number of our membership. I give this number from memory—not being present when all the letters were read, but it may be relied upon as being very nearly correct. Total number of communicants in the Republic, including Cape Palmas, six hundred and thirty—of which about two thirds are in the County of Monserrado. Estimating the American population of the Republic at Ten thousand, we have more than one fourteenth of the entire civilized population, worshippers in our Zion, holding the tradition of the fathers, and the faith once delivered to the saints." When it is reflected that our church is unendowed—that it has been left to struggle alone against the many discouragements and adverse influences by which it has been beset—that its ministers have, with few exceptions, been left to labor not only without remuneration, but unnoticed and unheeded by those whose friendly greetings would have cheered and nerved them; and all this amid the operations of other denominations putting into full effect and constant exertion, all the appliances and influence money could command—all this can be attributed only to the transforming and sustaining energy of the truth it embosoms, and which when it labors, it puts forth. We therefore "thank God and take courage."

It had been thirteen years since I was at Sinoe.—Then a few poles stuck upright in the sand, surrounded with clapboards, with a covering of palm leaf or some other equally frail material, composed the whole of the "Merica town" at Sinoe. Thirteen years, though short compared with some durations, is long in the brief term of human existence. Great changes have been made in that space. I had heard much of the improvements at Sinoe. The Sinoite visitors to Monrovia, had dwelt at length on what they had done, or intended to do, and I was prepared to see something. But I confess, the changes, improvements and the general air of industry and good arrangement, exceeded my expectations. The village stretches along a beach, which forms the bottom of a considerable bay. In front of the village there is a large number of palm trees, which would be graceful, if proper attention were paid to trimming and pruning them—through which, the cheerful dwellings would appear most charmingly, if blessed with the addition of a little whitewash. The lots are enclosed on the front with paling, and the neat little flower gardens in front of the houses impart an air of quietude, while it excites no mean opinion of the taste of the Sinoites. The houses are large and commodious. I was struck with this feature of the place, and concluded at once that the people are in a much better condition of life than most in my county. The social habits of the people present the most interesting subject of remark. They seem to me to have the advantage of the Monrovians in this respect. There appear to be more frankness and cordiality than I have elsewhere seen. I hold nothing worse than studied etiquette and ceremony. To a very allowable degree, this seems abandoned by the people there. And a frank open and cordial reception makes one feel as free and as easy as if at home. There is however, more of one feeling than should be indulged. I have been told that the people at Sinoe entertain the idea that an unfriendly or disrespectful feeling, is indulged for them by the people of the upper county. If it be a fact, I am a stranger to it. I, however, doubt its existence. I am very certain that no such feeling is entertained by respectable, sensible people of any one part of the Republic, of the people of any other part. Common sense too plainly teaches that our interest are too identified—too closely and intimately woven for one part of our common country to be in health, while the other part suffers from disease. This is a truth that deserves to be constantly remmberd. Monrovia, as the capitol or seat of Government, may have some advatages, if such they can be called. Such advantages are common to capitols. They will be the emporia of fashion and the foci of wit. Imported fashion and manners will flourish in such places, just as exotics luxurate the first year of their growth in a foreign soil. But these are advantages which are hardly to be coveted. But to close: the people at Sinoe have made great improvements and in some important respects, are ahead of the other counties, when the dates of the settlements are compared.

Yours Repectfully
H. TEAGE.

GUNPOWDER.

The Kames Gunpowder Company beg leave to announce that they have now an establishment in London for the sale of their various descriptions of Powder, manufactured upon the most approved principles, and under the skilful superintendence, which has obtained for it a decided preference at the Government Offices. Application at their Office 147 Leadenhall Street London, delivereable from their Magazines at Berkin Creek, Liverpool, Swansea, or up the Clyde. They confidently recommend for Engineering and Mining purposes their blasting powder, and to Sportsmen their Rifle, and their new and highly esteemed Crystal Powder which for strength, cleanness, and prompt ignition are unrivalled.

Parties requiring supplies are recommended to be particular in ordering the Powder manufactured by the Kames Gunpowder Company, London. Agents Larocque, Nanby & Co.

The undersigned have formed a Co-partnership, under the name of JOHN B JORDAN & Co. for the transaction of a General Mercantile Business in this City; and hope by strict attention to the business, and fair prices, to merit a share of public patronage.

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, Messrs Hyde, Hodge &co. of London, contractors with Her Britannic Majesty's Government, to furnish Laborers from the African Coast, for the West Indies, have sent some of their ships to the coast of the Republic, offering an advance of Ten Dollars for every person who may be induced to emigrate;—and, whereas, the extinction of the slave trade have left large numbers of predial and other laborers in the possession of the Chiefs, and principal men of the country.—While the offer of ten Dollars each, is nearly equivalent to the amount formerly paid for slaves, during the prevalence of the Slave Trade, and which operated mainly in producing and sustaining the wars, by which the country was distracted.—And, whereas, certain refractory Chiefs are reported to have engaged with the Agents of said Company, to furnish a number of Laborers, and are further known to have in concealment near Grand Cape Mount, a number of the unhappy victims of their predatory excursions.—And; Whereas, complaint has been made to the Government that persons are held to be sent off without their voluntary consent, or the consent of their natural guardians:—Therefore, to prevent the abuses and evils which might otherwise result from the enterprise:

Be it known by this Proclamation, to all whom it may concern, that the law regulating Passports must be strictly observed—that vessels carrying, or intending to carry away emigrants, must come to this port with their emigrants on board, to obtain passports—in order that an opportunity may be presented to the Government to ascertain whether the emigration be free or constrained. Every violation of the law regulating passports, will be visited with the utmost penalty of the law, in that case made and provided.

Done at Monrovia this Twenty Sixth day of February, In the Year of our Lord, One Thousand, Eight Hundred and Fifty Three: And of the Republic the Fifth.

One of the drollest occurrence in the annals of gallantry is related of Gibbon the historian, who was short in stature and very fat. One day being alone with the beautiful Madame de Cruzas, he dropped on his knees before her, and made a declaration of his love in the most passionate terms. The astonished lady rejected his suit, and requested him to rise. The abashed historian remained on his knees. 'Rise, Mr. Gibbon, I beseech you rise.' Mr Gibbon still kept his posture. 'Mr. Gibbon will you have the goodness to get up?' 'Alas, madame,' faltered the unlucky lover 'I cannot.' He was too fat to regain his feet without assistance.—Madame de Crouzas rang the bell, and said to her servant, 'Lift up Mr. Gibbon.'

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MARCH 2nd, 1853.

As the trade of Liberia with England, is considerably on the increase, and as it is highly important to the merchants of Liberia, that they should understand somewhat of the character of the English laws which regulate commerce, we have thought it advisable to insert a case recently decided in England more especially are we led to this, from the fact of the article in question being Palm Oil, and the staple commodity of Liberia commerce. "The London Times" of 20th January last, in its list of reported cases, has the followin —"Rossetter V. Cahlmann." "This was a demurrer to a rejoinder which raised the question whether a contract for sundry gallons of palm oil, "old measure," to be delivered on the coast of Africa and paid for in Liverpool, was an illegal contract within the 5th: and 6th: of William IV. C. 63. S. 21, because it was not made in the "imperial measure" established by that statute.

Mr. M Smith, for the plaintiff, contended that the statute in question could not apply to any contract except such as was made within the United Kingdom."

Mr. Field, being called on to support his plea, submitted that the contract, though made with reference to foreign goods, was one to be performed in England, and therefore fell within the 21st: section of the statute"

"The Court, however, held that the statute could only apply to contracts wholly arising within the United Kingdom, and could not be extended to foreign transactions such as that on which the plaintiff sued. There must, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff. Judgment accordingly."

Our Trade. It will give some idea of the rapid increase of our trade, when it is known that at least sixty thousand dollars of merchantdize have been sold in our city within the last three months—it must also be borne in mind that very nearly half of these three months have been of the dull season the time appropriated for the clearing of lands for farming purposes. It may be safely calculated, that to meet the demands of the trade of our city for the next ten months, there will be required nearly half a million of dollars of merchandize It is astonishing how greatly the demand for goods of almost every description encreases—and if we count the supply required in other parts of Liberia, the supply must be increased about eight hundred thousand dollars. There is not to our knowledge any permanent arrangement in existence, for the supply of this large amount of foreign goods! Must the larger portion of the profits of this great trade go into the pockets of foreign merchants? This ought not to be so, tho' we cannot see how it is to be avoided for this year at least. It is true that a company of our merchants have entered into arrangements for quantities of goods from America and England, but we are clearly of opinion, unless their plans are placed on a far more extended scale, they will do but little towards the accomplishment of the purposes, which gave rise to the formation of the company.

We have thrown out these remarks for the benefit of our merchants and traders:—and they should give some heed to them Who, more than they, should receive the advantages of the trade of Liberia?

Some idea may be obtained of the value of lands in Monrovia, when it is known, that five hundred dollars, have, been paid for town lots, containing a quarter of an acre—and further, that that sum will not purchase lots of similar size, in some parts of the city.

It affords us great pleasure to record whatever has a bearing on the progress of education in Liberia, and especially when it relates to the education" al advancement of the "fair sex."

The Ladies of the "Monrovia Literary Institute" —a Society we consider very interesting celebrated their anniversary on Monday evening the 14th ult, at the Senate Chamber.

There was quite a number of spectators present, all of whom, agree that the exercises of the occasion, performed under the direction of Mr B. V. R. James, were very interesting.

The exercises were opened with singing, followed by the reading of the Scriptures and prayer by Rev. D. A. Wilson. The Constitution of the Society was then read by Mrs M. E. McGill, the Secretary. After which an address "on the vanity of worldly pursuits" was delivered by Mr. E. W. Blyden. The Society again sung. After which Miss L. A. Smith recited, very creditably, an "original piece." which interested and amused the audience considerably —After a few introductory remarks, informing the audience what the character of the exercises of the occasion would be, Miss L. went on to speak of the importance of the mental and moral culture of females—in view of the great and powerful, though silent, influence which they exert upon Society &c. We were quite pleased with her remarks, and agree with her as to the importance of female education. In every civilized community females have a powerful influence and just as civilization advances does this influence obtain an important character. In proportion as the women are enlightened and virtuous, will men be, they emphatically "rule the world," and "govern men." After Miss L. several other pieces were recited, among which those of Miss Ann Warring and Miss Jane Johnson were interesting and well recited. The dialogues were also pleasing

Those who engaged in them are entitled to credit for the clear and distinct manner in which they spoke. The whole affair was remarkably gratifying.

The exercises were concluded at an early hour, when many left, regretting that they were not more protracted. We cordially wish success to the institution.

The peculiar position, and circumstances of the Ladies of Liberia, call for their mental culture, and improvement in literature.—Not only on account of the influence which they exert upon Society—but for various other reasons which we cannot at present advert to. And it has always been a matter of regret to us that the greater part of our ladies here have not enjoyed any very remarkable advantages for literary acquisitions. All that they have acquired has been by their own efforts and perseverance.

But while we cannot point to any celebrated literary character among them; it is gratifying to observe that some of them at least, have felt the necessity of the literary improvement of their sex, and have, with some success, united themselves for the promotion of the object. We earnestly hope that the Ladies of the Institute will appreciate their advantages, and go on, by diligent and persevering application to study, to greater improvements. And may their example so influence others of their sex, in Liberia that they may all pursue knowledge & become "by proper cultivation of the mind and heart." blessing to Society—'pillars in Zion'—examples to the heathen around them—and ornaments to their country.

British Consul. Arrived on the 21th inst per Mail Steamer "Faith" John George Cope Lewis Newnham Esqr: Her Britannic Majesty's consul to this Republic, with power to appoint Vice-consuls in his consulate—and in his capacity he was, on the 26th inst: received, and acknowledged by His Excellency the President.

Boyer of Trade Town, is now more than ever reaping the bitter fruits of his rebellion. None of the chiefs in any part of the Bassa County, sympathise with him. The fact is all along, they have dreaded, him, and now as he is very much weakened, they make no secret of the enmity which they always had for him. We learn that hundreds of his warriors have abandoned him and pledged themselves to Joe West of New Cesters, and James Flor at Trade Town. But Boyer's present position is a very unenviable one: from being the most wealthy and powerful chief in all the Bassa County, he has become the most weak, and despised In a conversation which he had with a foreignor—an englishman, a few weeks back, he acknowledged that his rebellion to the Government, was decidedly wrong —that he was influenced to the course he took by others; and that he was willing to make any concession the Government might require of him. "Grando," he said, was one of the leading persons in bringing him into collision with the Liberian Government but that he was no longer in his power, but that he had absconded, and succeeded in reaching a place of safety, and in consequence he could not apprehend him Boyer should not forget, that it is known, that Grando left Trade Town with his consent,—this fact, if need be can be well established, and according to our notion of things, he should be held accountable.

The Military Expedition. We have on several occasions made reference to the unwarrantable conduct of Boombo, in persisting in carrying on his predatory wars in the Little Cape Mount territory—upon chiefs at peace, and in alliance with our Government, in direct violation of his solemn treaty stipulations. At first Boombo, confined his attacks, to the towns of Dwarloo-Beh, and, tho' every measure of a pacific character, has been resorted to, to induce him to cease his depredations, he has continued to carry them on, with a recklessness truly astonishing Indeed, such has been the perverseness of this chieftian's conduct—that not satisfied in laying waste, with fire and sword, the towns and villages in the Little Cape Mount country—but he has actually crossed the Little Cape Mount river, attacked and destroyed several of the towns of the inoffensive Deys—murdered numbers of the unsuspicious inhabitants, and carried off hundreds into captivity—even this did not content him, he destroyed several of the factories of our merchants and the loss in merchandize is very considerable. It is said, that Prince George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, is deeply implicated with Boombo, but we have no idea of the nature and extent of the connection.

The Executive in December last, called the attention of the Legislature to the conduct of Boombo —the subject had the consideration of that body, and the result was, an act, authorizing the President to employ military force to quell the disturbances in the Little Cape Mount territory, and making suitable appropriation for the purpose. President Roberts, immediately on the adjournment of the Legislature, sent a messenger to Boombo, reminding him of the conditions of the treaty then subsisting between him and our Government and ordered him to discontinue his depredations, and lay the subject of his complaints before him—so intent has been the Government to restore peace to the country, that, for nearly three months, at considerable expenditure of money, it has been trying to convince Boombo of his wrong doings, and to influence him to restore peace—all the pacific intentions of the Government have proved unavailing President Roberts determined, at last, to bring matters to an issue, and to this end, he ordered George Cain to meet him at Little Cape Mount, with Boombo, and his other allies, and the first of March was named for the meeting. On that morning the President left here, with two hundred armed men, and the same day, it is probable he was at the place. It is not expected that a necessity will exist for any fighting, still it is well to be prepared for any emergency. In a day or two we expect to receive intelligence from him.

Chevalier Niteroi, the Brazillian Charge de Affairs to this Government, left here last evening in the U. S. Ship John Adams for St. Vincent, where he expects to take passage in one of the Steamers for Rio De Janeiro South America

Some year or two ago the King of Denmark married privately a milliner and dressmaker of Copenhagen named Louise Rasmussen. At the same time she was raised into the ranks of the nobility by the title of the Countess Danner. The lady's earlier reputation has not been perfectly spotless, but she was as good as her bridegroom, with whom she had been on intimate terms for some time previously.—The marriage was intended to be of the sort called morganatic, or left handed, in this kind of unions, which are peculiar to royal and noble families of Northern Europe, the wife and children are excluded from rights belonging to the rank, and from the succession of the husband The Countess Danner —who is forty-three years old, rather stout and very plain, but kind hearted and full of tact, has never been publicly acknowledged at Copenhagen as the wife of Frederic VII, but he has always spoken of her as such to his intimates. Every body knows the fact of their marriage Recently however, on occasion of a visit made by the Countess to Jutland, she was received with regal honors by magistrates and justices as if she had been the Queen and since then it has been whispered about that the monarch intends to legitimate the children. He expects a tempest in the [illegible]

POETRY

From The Friend.

WHEN I AM OLD.

When I am old--and, O how soon
Will life's sweet morning yield to noon,
And noon's broad, fervid, earnest light
Be shaded in the solemn night!
Till, like a story well nigh told,
Will seem my life--when I am old.

When I am old, this breezy earth
Will lose for me its voice of mirth--
The streams will have an undertone
Of sadness not by right their own;
And spring's sweet power in vain unfold
Its fairy charms--when I am old.

When I am old, I shall not care
To deck with flowers my faded hair;
'T will be no vain desire of mine
In rich and costly dress to shine;
Bright jewels and the brightest gold
Will charm me nought--when I am old

When I am old, my friends will be
Old, and infirm, and bowed, like me;
Or else, their bodies 'neath the sod,
Their spirits dwelling safe with God.
The old church bell will long have toll'ed
Above the rest--when I am old.

When I am old, I'd rather bend
Thus sadly o'er each buried friend,
Than see them lose the earnest truth,
That sparkled in friendship of our youth;
'T will be so sad to have them cold
Or strange to me--when I am old!

When I am old--O how it seems
Like the wild lunacy of dreams,
To picture in prophetic rhyme
That dim, far-distant, shadowy time;
So distant that it seems o'er bold
Even to say--"When I am old!"

When I am old!--perhaps ere then
I shall be missed from haunts of men;
Perhaps my dwelling will be found
Beneath the green and quiet mound,
My name by stranger hands enrolled
Among the dead--ere I am old.

Ere I am old--that time is now,
For youth sits lightly on my brow;
My limbs are firm, and strong, and free,
Life has a thousand charms for me;
Charms that will long their influence hold
Within my heart--ere I am old.

Ere I am old--O let me give
My life to learning how to live!
Then shall I meet with welcoming heart
An early summons to depart,
Or find an heightened days consoled
By God's sweet peace--when I am old!

THE CRATERS OF THE MOON.

A FRIGHTFUL CHASM.

Not less than three-fifths of the surface of our satellite are studded with vast caverns, or rather circular pits, penetrating into its mass, and usually engirt at the top with a high wall of rock, which is sometimes serrated and crowned by peaks. These craters vary in diameter from fifty or sixty miles to the smallest place visible—probably five hundred feet—and the numbers increase as the diameter diminishes, so that the multitude of the smaller ones become so great, that we cannot reckon it. The ridge which environs the crater is always stopping on its external side, and steep or rather precipitous within, although it seldom descends to the cavern's base, by a single cliff or leap. Within it, there are generally concentric ridges, assuming the form of terraces, and making the descent to the bottom as the central chasm appears more gradual.—The bottom of the crater is sometimes convex, low ridges of mountains being also found running through it, while at its centre, conical peaks frequently rise, and smaller craters, whose height, however, seldom reaches the base of the exterior wall. These curious objects are so crowded in some parts of the moon, that they seem to have pressed on each other, and disturbed, and even broken down, each others edges, so that through their mutual interference the most odd-shaped caverns have arisen.

The crater Tycho is that brilliant spot near the top of the moon, which, when the moon is full, it appears the centre of a system of shining streams or rays. The country around is peculiarly disturbed; there is no plain there larger than a common field. Now, if passing across that rugged district, one were gradually approaching Tycho, its first and distant aspect would seem like an immense wall or ridge of rock in the horizon, with a stretch of nearly fifty miles, and reflecting the sun's rays with a peculiar lustre; on approaching the ridge its character would change; we should then discern that it is part of an immense circle, but perhaps neither so lofty, nor so steep, that a practiced mountaineer of the earth need shrink from its ascent. Suppose the ascent accomplished, and that with terrestrial ideas one stood on the summit. Trusting to the analogy of every disturbed region of our own planet, we must have thought of the opposite side, while it was unseen, only a descent, which if different in steepness, would correspond in extent; but the eye is now in the presence of an appalling contrast! On the edge of a dizzy cliff, passing down by one unbroken leap for 13,000 feet, the traveller gazes below him in terror and bewilderment, At the base of the cliff several low parallel terraces creep along; but a little onward the depth of the chasm is revealed, and it descends from the top of the ridge no less than 17,000 feet or 20,000 feet more than the summit of Mount Blanc rises above the level of the sea. It is quickly perceived, too, that this huge barrier encloses a vast circular area fifty-five miles in diameter; so that if the spectator were at the chasm's centre, he would find around him on every side, at the distance of twenty-seven miles, a gigantic and unbroken wall—unbroken by gap or ravine, or pass of every description—rising into the air 17,000 feet, and forbidding his return to the external world!

How frightful that seclusion in the moon—a chasm utterly impassable, its walls bare, rugged, hopeless, as a prison's bars! It is a solitude, too, which nothing alleviates; verdure is never there, not the song of a bird; rain never refreshes, nor cloud shelters it; it is relieved from a scorching sun and flaming sky only by night with its stars. Nor among those countless pits is Tycho the most appalling. There are some of nearly equal depths whose diameter may not exceed 3,000 feet, nay, towards the polar regions of the moon, caverns probably exist, whose depths have never yet been illuminated by one beam of the solar light.—Nichol.—Southern Baptist.

THE TRUTH ADVANCING IN ITALY.

Testimony from different quarters concurs in affirming that the word of God is glorified in Italy, notwithstanding all efforts to obstruct its course. Colonel Tronchin, President of the Italian Society, Geneva, in a letter to the Rev. Dr. Hallock, acknowledging a donation of $500 from the American Tract Society, after mentioning the issue of a collection of hymns in Italian for which a great demand existed, and the intention of the society to publish divers other books, adds:

"Italy is now under a pressure that does not allow us to labor with so great facility as we could desire. Nevertheless, the kingdom of God advances. We have received at Geneva several converted Italians, whom we are instructing systematically in the word of God. By this means we hope to furnish good and faithful missionaries for that unhappy country.

"The iron hand which crushes Italy has no power to arrest the work of the Holy Spirit. Souls are brought, one by one, to read the word of God and various tracts, which we are enabled to furnish them by providential means. In many places in Piedmont, Bible-readings are kept up by converts. They are small congregations, it is true, but then the kingdom of God cometh not with observation.

"We have lately witnessed some gratifying conversions among the Italians. A judge at Naples, a very zealous Catholic, having retired to Rome, witnessed there all the Popish abominations, and became infidel and materialistic. Obliged to flee from Italy, he took refuge at Athens, and procured a Bible for the purpose of making sport of it, having heard Dr. King, the American missionary, speak of it. He spent a year and a half at Athens, and then left for Constantinople, an infidel still. Being compelled to return to Italy on account of his health, he arrived at Turin ill, and dropped in at a little Bible meeting held by one of our missionary friends and some converted workmen. The Lord there converted him, and he is now with us at Geneva; studying for the ministry. D'Merle D'Aubigne approves him as destined, to all appearance, to become a very able helper."

HOWE'S CAVE.

Not far from Schoharie Court house, New York, is one of the greatest subterranean wonders in the world. It is a cave—called Howe's Cave—and is next in size to the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, which has a world-wide celebrity. It was accidentally discovered about eight years ago, by Mr. Lester Howe, its present proprietor, and is now becoming, every year, an object of attraction to tourists from all parts of the country.

Four years ago we penetrated it to the distance of five miles. It has been explored to the distance of seven miles from its entrance! Mr. Howe has had many strange and perilous adventures in the course of his explorations, which he retails to his visitors while piloting them from room to room, and from hall to hall of his great under-ground curiosity shop.

A short time since, Messrs. Young and S. Gross of Albany, New York, with their ladies, visited the cave, and spent several hours in it, traversing a number of miles of its winding passages, and gazing with astonishment upon its vastness, its grandeur, and its mineral beauties. They visited the "Entrance," "Dining" and "Specimen" rooms; the "Washington," "Cataract," "Congress," "Music," and "Governor's" halls; the "Harlem Tunnel," the "Pool of Siloam," the "Indian Stone Stairs," the "Franklin Avenue," the "Museum," "Music Lake," "Giant's Study," and "Pirate's Cave;" the "Rocky Mountains," "Jehosaphat's Valley, the "Winding Way," and the mighty "Rotunda; "reaching a point five and a half miles from the entrance. They emerged at last, fatigued, but highly delighted with all that they had seen and heard away down in the heart of the mountain.

A visit to this remarkable cave is well worth the little time and trouble required. Mr. Howe is always at hand, and thoroughly prepared to attend to his guests. He is a gentleman, well-informed, and a most entertaining and companionable guide.—Pyila' Presbeterian.

DREAMS.

Dreams usually take place in a single instant, notwithstanding the length of time they seem to occupy. They are, in fact, slight mental sensations unregulated by consciousness; these sensations, being less or more intense, painful or agreeable, according to certian physical conditions. On this subject the following observation occur in Dr. Winslow's Psychological Journal: "We have in dreams no true perception of the lapse of time, a strange property of mind! for if such be also its property when entered into the eternal disembodied state, time will appear to us eternity. The relations of space, as well as of time, are also annihilated; so that while almost, an eternity is compressed into a moment, infinite space is traversed more swiftly than by real thought. There are numerous illustrations of this principal on record. A gentleman dreamed that he had enlisted as a soldier, joined his regiment, deserted, was apprehended, carried back, tried, condemned to be shot, and at last led out for execution. After all the usual preparations, a gun was fired; he awoke with the report, and found that a noise in the adjoining room had, at the same moment, produced the dream, and awaken him. A friend of Dr. Abercrombie dreamed that he had crossed the Atlantic, and spent a fortnight in America. In embarking on his return, he fell into the sea, and awakening in the fright, found that he had not been asleep ten minutes."—The Presbyterian

A SHORT STORY.

On Dickens' last voyage home, the Captain had on board a young lady of remarkable personal attraction—an phrase I use as being one entirely new, and one never met with in the newspapers. This young lady was beloved intensely by five young gentlemen passengers, and in return she was in love with them all very ardently, without any particular preference for either. Not knowing how to make up her determination in this dilemma, she consulted my friend, the captain.

The captain, being a man of an original turn of mind, says to the young lady, jump over board, and marry the man who jumps after you.' The lady struck with the idea, being naturally fond of bathing, especially in warm weather, as it then was, took the advice of the captain, who had a boat ready manned in case of accident. Accordingly, the next morning, the five lovers being on deck, and looking very devotedly at the young lady, she plunged into the sea head foremost.—Four of the lovers immediately after her. When the young lady and her four lovers got out again, she says to the captain 'what am I to do with them now they are so wet?' Says the captain. 'Take the dry one.'—And the young lady did and married him.—Virginia Herald.

COURSE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN PHILOSOPHY.

By Victor Cousin. Translated by. O. W. Wight. 2 vols., pp 448, 460. Appleton, N. Y. Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse, Main st. Richmond.

This is an elegant translation and an elegant edition of the most popular book of the most eloquent metaphysician which France has ever produced. VICTOR COUSIN is the father of that school of intellectual philosophy known as the Eclecticism of Modern France. It is a graft of HEGEL and KAUNT's idealism on the old stock of pure sensationism, originating in Locke, and brought to maturity in France by CONDILLAC and his compeers. COUSIN and the modern eclectics reject the notion that all primary ideas are derived from the sense; but do not follow the Germans to their ultimate deductions. They make a union of the two schools—and assert the principles of the new party in the spirit of the old.

Deceived by the title, some persons may attempt to read this book of COUSINS' Lectures to get from it a general view of the history of metaphysical science, with such sketches of its chief writers and most memorable books as will enable them to talk on the subject without gross blunders—or at least to understand the allusions of others who have devoted their time thereto. But they will not find these volumes to be what they want. COUSINS' lectures are rather eloquent expositions of his own system, than the memoirs of metaphysical literature. The class of readers to whom we have referred will find a much better book for their purposes in MORELL'S "Historical View of Modern Philosophy in the Nineteenth Century."

MORELL'S work, though written in the spirit of an ingenious partizan, and not very thorough in any of its discussions, is very clear, very readable, and very comprehensive. It treats the progress of metaphysical science down to the latest date, and is therefore a work calculated to be very useful to the general reader, and to the educated gentlemen of this country. Few of these desire to go farther than MORELL will lead them into the mists and clouds of that tangled wilderness of dream land. For metaphysical studies are neither common nor popular in the United States. We share NAPOLEON'S antipathy to the idealogists. It is a practical country. No new "school" of metaphysics has yet sprung up in the United States—for which the Lord be praised. No particular system has taken a general hold on all the class even of those who have the time, cultivation and mental turn for the prosecution of abstract speculation. There is one system, however, which may one day take a deep and an enduring root in the mind of the United States—one book of metaphysics which will be read if ever translated and published here with avidity and received with enthusiasm by a vast portion of the people—that book is COMTE'S Course de Philosophie Positive Novum Organon of the nineteenth century.—Richmond Senior Weekly Examiner.

Artificial Beautifiers.

The chemistry of the toilet-table has provided many preparations under the name of Cosmetics, for external adornment or artificial beautifying. Hair dyes, pomatums, pomades, depilatories, dentifrices, tooth powders, &c., may all be deemed more or less as belonging to the class of cosmetics; but the name is usually confined to those preparations which are applied to the skin.

The best cosmetic is plain soap and water. To soften the skin, however, many substances are used, such as almond soap, Naples soap, Castile soap, milk of roses, cold cream, or almond paste. Sometimes it is desired to harden the cuticle or outer skin, and this is done by spirit, astringents, and acids. For removing or hiding freckles, various lotions and washes are employed. To give an artificial tint or bloom to the skin is the chief work of the cosmetic artist. Rouge and carmine are much employd to give a red tint: starch and magnesia to impart a delicate whiteness. Several of the salts of bismuth and lead, under the various fine names of pearl white, flake white, cream of roses, &c., are often employed as cosmetics; but they have an injurious effect on the skin, and sometimes produce a sort of skin-poisoning.

A want of attention to the chemical action of colors has sometimes led ladies into an embarrassing predicament. Bismuth powder, sometimes sold as a substitute for genuine pearl powder, has the property of turning black when in contact with fumes of sulphur, or with sulphuretted hydrogen gas. A lady who painted with this cosmetic, happened to bathe in a mineral water impregnated with this gas; and the consequence was that the artificially whitened skin turned nearly black, and so remained for several weeks. Another lady, who used the same cosmetic, attended a lecture at Harrogate on mineral waters; and the lecturer handed round a bottle containing sulphuretted water, that its odour might illustrate the point on which he was directing attention the lady did as others did—smell at the bottle; and the result was that she became, not merely figuratively, but literally black in the face." Even the coals of a common fire often contain enough sulphur to produce in a slighter degree an analagous effect. Instances have been known in which a lady, seated near a large fire at Christmast time, has had one side of her white neck tinged with a darkness which puzzled all, except those who were aware of the effect of sulphur upon bismuth cosmetics.—True Union.

We often hear ladies say that they wish they were gentlemen. We question if they'd do so if they could once taste the luxury of shaving on a cold morning with a dull razor.

PUNCH TO BROTHER JONATHAN.

Punch is not always jocular Punch is sometimes very serious, and very much in earnest, and speaks a strong and timely word for humanity and right If he were always jocular, his position before the world would never have become what it is. We have been struck with the following sentences from a recent paragraph upon the Fish question. "We must recollect," says Punch, "that Jonathan is now the only national creature of any importance, except ourselves, that is not priest-ridden and soldier-ridden; the soldier in the saddle, and the jack-priest on the crupper. Our national relation to Jonathan, at present, should be that of a league, offensive and defensive, against despotism and papal petticoat government all over the world" True, Mr. P—— If there has been a period since the Christian era, when the continent of Europe has been more under the domination of tyrant and priest than it now is, we do not remember that period. Blot out from the map of the world the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and Mankind might well despair! But those countries are not going to be blotted out, nor are they going to try to blot out each other, and mankind need not despair. Long live Mr. Punch! —Home Journal.

ANCIENT RUINS.

A correspondent of the Providence Journal attached to the Mexican Boundary Commission, makes mention of curious ancient ruins discovered by the party on the Colorado river near its junction with the Gilla. The party struck an acequia, or irrigating canal, and, following the course of this, came out upon a low table land, where they found the ruins One was a fragment of wall still remaining, and the outlines of a large outer wall inclosing the building could be traced. The ground for an extent of several miles is strewn with broken pottery, metates, (grinding stones,) and pestles, and fragments of marine shells are occasionally found. Similar ruins are said to be frequent up the river, and also upon the San Francisco, which unites with the Salinas.

There is no doubt that these valleys were once filled with a dense population, far enough advanced in civilization to build houses of several stories in height, surrounded with regular out works and to irrigate their lands by canals extending miles in length, but they seem to have left no trace or tradition by which we can tell who they were, or what was their fate. The only answer the neighboring Indians can give to these questions is the ever ready "quien saba" Those and the ruins found upon the Gila, above the Pinos villages, are known among the Indians as houses of the Montezumas.—Southern Baptis.

Whatever deters the progress of society in its moral course, in a parallell with its progression, it is a destroyer of human happiness. And whatever destroys our enjoyments we all must say is the instrument of our sadest calamity; for that which deprives a man of pleasure, deprives him of one of the dearest attributes of his nature. because it impedes the cristal flow of vital power, and when this function ceases to supply the mind, yea, all that compose the man, from its pure stream, we grow faint, we sicken, yea we give up the ghost This is a true figure, Society needs for its perpetual existence, as much the pure flowing springs of morality, as the body does, daily nourishment, for let all created things around, show their subjugation and decay, in whatever way they may if in ten thousand forms, not all the proof born in them, can prevent the stern and rising truth, viz; that mind is immortal. If then the truth compels us to acknowledge mind immortal, then whatever tends to vitiate that high destined principle, is so much a destroyer of the happiness of man. He is a social being, and can be happy in no other field. Though golden flowers by angels hands were strewed in his path every morning. He can float on no other stream, though the muses invited him in song from, the fairest elysian fields that fancy could paint, or wealth invite from an opposite shore. Hence it is that whenever we are brought so low in vice, as to be heedless of social ties and virtue, we have the surest index to the truth that the body may fall a reck and decay, but it is the immortal mind that's injured,—it is immortal mind that has suffered, and must continue on to suffer. The licentious, it is true, break through all bounds and scorn restraint, and often appear to prosper while glorying in their own shame. The thief, though cursed of God, because he violates a sacred law, may go on poisoning the vital spring of society, and though he may as a free booter, run a race for a long time, to the great injury of the community in which he is permitted to live, yet he cannot escape the avenger—he has heaped up wrath for his own soul, that must feel the eternal sting. Remorse;—what a hell is this?

But the wicked regard it not There may be fifty persons in a community who would scorn the idea of theft, but there may be also a hundred persons who make it their business to steal where they can, and from whoever they can; there is no respect of persons with such a clan as this. Thus it is that we have the contaminating influence growing in our midst, and thus it is that society becomes almost imperceptibly vitiated. Evil is always soonest caught and learned by the young, hence it is, that often in the bosom of a most virtuous family, the rouge, the murderer, the rowdy and hypocritical scoundral, is found. This is not confined to any one place under the sun, but he must blush alike on all places, and was it not that there are a few who have been taught at the school of Christ, lessons of truth, honor and equality, this world that once received mankind in a happier state, would be turned into a very hell, and the sufferers, if perchance there should any be, might plead at the bar of the court of chancery a thousand years as generations, come and go, without one word of sympathy or redress. We speak no parable now, this is no fiction, but a truth which is its own expositor But it is consoling to know that although signs of fallen humanity are prevalent where ever we go, there is to be seen, men of truth, integrity and sound sense, a chose few, who frown down the mean man and the thief into the same dismal slough alike To such as these my fellow citizens you owe the pillowed hue of repose, that you enjoy when the toils of the day are over How much then should it be considered the duty of every one, to bend the whole power of their influence towards mending the hearts and improving the morals of the youth, in every country, for mind is immortal, and all must answer for sins of omission and commission, and of those of omission, there are none of greater weight than those of neglecting to train up the young in the way they should go. And let all duly weigh this matter as one of vital importance In England, it becomes a duty of the highest consideration, and after all the combined efforts of the moral portion of the community; there is an overwhelming list of crime produced by the advocates every year, and a warning voice is continually heard issuing from the pulpits, the throne, and every judgment seat, against this fell destroyer of human happiness. And should not Liberia awake to her interest in this respect, has she not a common cause with the rest of the moral world to plead? Has she not interest at home to see after, which if neglected will cause her to mourn in helpless silence, with a heart bleeding, pierced, smitten fallen. Early did man after he came out of the ark, begin to sin by immorality. Early indeed has Liberia had cause, to curb the growing evil among her youth, and set up her moral standard. Knowing that in morality we hasten on to fortunes that will outlive our days, and stand out in life and beauty down through other times. And that fortunes gained by immoral means, hasten on to oblivion. Then as a noble and lofty bearing, is characteristic of a nation's honor worth and favor, much should every man covet such a prize

Now man is not called on to declare his sentiment, in word, but he is more powerful in his silence his conduct is a monitor that acts like a spell, and all feel to be led by some pleasant influence; to the fountain of lasting pleasures There is another point of importance enough, to be duty considered. We should never leave out to the last, our powers of usefulness, for then what we offer to morality is not worth having, because then it would seem to say, that life is nothing when it is over. This is light and frivolous, and those who hold it as a doctrine must surely fall. For to be morrally good, is to have a knowledge of the source of all goodness, and to fear God and keep his commandment, is the whole duty of man.

But we will not extend this article further; because we think a continuation of the narrative of the French Revolution would be far more interesting In viewing this subject, we have before us, the heart-sickening effects of immoral sunsion when it is allowed to rise to such a fearful height as is seen in the all pervading power of a revolution, and also the sad havoc perpetrated in a few short hours, under the famous rule of a lawless mob. The wise look on and ween, and the moralist beholds and trembles Look at the sudden transitions, from one degree to another. The statesman to day bows a nation, at his feet, by the power of his genius and eloquence, and tomorrow he barely escapes from the hand of the lawless mob. The hero is seen flying through the earth like a flaming meteor, as scourge sent of God to reak his vengeance on rebelious man he mounts his fiery car, the sword deal death before him; while the worst of desolations follow in his train wake Napoleon the Great, (for he was unquestionably great, among the worldly great ones,) crossed the Alps as if to bury the heroic deeds of Hannibal in oblivion; and standing on the pericids of Egypt, he looked down on the fame of Alexander. Wellington fought and bled, and now Napolean, and the Iron Duke are no more. How quick, how total has been their transit, we see then the transition of all sublunary things, there is no earthly thing that abideth. How earnestly then should we seek unto God who is eternal, in duration,. And ever let our prayers be from battle and murder, and from sudden death, good Lord deliver us. But let us now turn to our narrative.

The Revd: gentleman proceeded, and said Called by duty to follow the rappel drum; down the Rue de Challot found the people in high excitement, and the sentry at a post busily chatting with women and gaining, on returning into the Champs Elizees, I found an immense flame towering in the centre of the grand avenue, a wooden bureau had been set on fire in a line with the central windows of the Tuileries, so that it could not fail to be seen from the palace, All Paris is surrounded by walls with gates of issue at different points, and at these gates large custom house offices. Two of them still in the line of the palace window, were close by, they two were soon startling, the Tuilries with sheets of flames. Those who committed these first overt acts of the revolution were nearly all gamins, boys and youth: Oh, scene like that tells us in a voice of thunder, the worth of a movement such as that with which we have the happiness to be, this night, disconnected. No plague more deadly could yod inflict on any country than to leave within its bosom a multitude of untaught and irreligious youth, to you young men of Liberia. I speak with that scene ful in my mind's eye; seeing still, those youths with their torches, had by rushing on those buildings, meaning by their deeds, to light up not a custom house, but a civil war. In the name of all you hold dear and patriotic, as well as of those nelier things that belong to eternity, I adjure you, every one not to leave his post in a condition in which it is liable in a moment of evil passion to dash into a deed that might bring upon your country torrents of blood shed and woe. Feel young men, oh feel that all the claims of your race bind you to be in a condition, (and in such condition, he that seeks grace from God will be) that whatever crisis may ever be upon, you shall so stand when that crisis is over; that no remorse shall gnaw your heart, no marks of flame remain to reproach you, no blood to call vengeance on your head. This is a thrilling appeal to the good sense of all men, let the inhabitants of Liberia, and especially the rising generation, read and meditate reverently, earnestly and deeply on these warning words, (his heavenly admonition) The Tuesday night passed in disquiet. On the Wednesday morning barricades were found extensively erected, a large part of Paris was in arms, the rapiel beat again. The National Guards answered, but sent deputations to the King, demanding reform, and every where cast themselves between the troops and the mob, so as to protect the latter. From the beginning it had been known that the 80,000 troops were but an apparent force, for they would act with the National Guards, however it might turn. During the day several skirmishes took place. An immense body of the people marched triumphantly to the Hotel de Ville and delivered up to the authorities fifty soldiers of the municipal guards, whose lives they had spared, but whom they had conducted through the streets disarmed and bareheaded.

In the Chamber of Deputies, a member asked the Ministry why they had not sooner called out the National Guard. M. Guizot replied that the King had sent for Count Mole; the news spread through Paris like lightning. The joy was indescribable Louis Phillipe trembled before a popular demonstration. Louis Phillippe yielded to the people in arms. The Parisians could scarcely believe their triumph, they were in ecstacies, for the change from Guizot to Mole, they cared little, but they had conquered the headstrong old King. They were victorious—they were proud—they were joyous. The city was then lighted up with brilliant illuminations, men said. All is over, all will be well. The Marseillaise rose merrily from thousands of voices, and wherever you went, you heard the tones of joys and singing.

Amid all this, Guizot had the impudence to cause this Hotel (which stands right up the Boulevard the chief thoroughfare of Paris) to be surrounded by a formidable guard They constantly irritated the crowd by driving them from their course, out into the encumbered street. During this excitement, a column was seen ad-

vaning, from the direction of the Bastile. Two men in blousers were seen carrying torches, between them, a third man in a blouse, bore a red flag; close behind him, another, held upon a pike an iongo on fire, which burned as they marched, following this double flag of blood and fire, were about two hundred men. The people watched and wondered. Probably that sinister column was a ruse of the republican party, who saw that the opportunity of a revolution was just escaping from them. The column came abreast of the guard before Guizot's Hotel. The officer in command advances toward the leader. The leader advanced towards him. They parly, a gun goes off. The officer's horse stumbled, he dashes within the square formed by his men—they raised their guns, and in a moment from forty to sixty men and women are lying dead on the Boulevard. To arms, to arms, rose in an instant, as the cry of whole multitudes, and away through the eastward part of the city, floated with wondrous speed, that fearful cry. To arms, we are betrayed, they are assassinating us To arms, gentlemen bareheaded and wild, rushed into the adjourning streets shouting. To arms, to arms; and from the towers of the churches the terrible tocsin began to ring. Seventeen corpse were placed upon a wagon. Men with torches marched before it, other men with torches took their stand upon the car of death, and others in the same [illegible] dragged it along, as it passed through [illegible] streets, one man held up the dead body of a [illegible] till the blood and wounds were seen in the torch light, and then letting it fall back into the wagon, he shouted "vengeance" They stopped before the office of the great republican paper, the National, M. Marrast, the editor harrangued them with promises of justice. While he spoke, a boy putting his two fingers into the wound of one of the dead, showed them in the torch light all reddened, and lifting them towards heaven, cried, this is the blood of a martyr, it shall be washed out in the blood of our oppression." With like excitements this terrible carnage passed during the night through all the inflammable parts of the city. In the morning the whole populace were up for an irrepressible out break. During the night, the King called M. Thiers and gave the government into his hands and those of M. Barrot. But by some singular—shall we say Providence, the proclation they wrote announcing their appointments was not signed. Nor was that appointment given to the Moniteur. When that official Journal came out all that the people had authenticated was that Marshall Bugeaud had been created Marshall or Commandant of Paris. In fact all that was conciliating was left out, and all that was inflamable was inserted. The effect was screams of indignation. It is enough, we'll have no more of Louis Phillipe or his family. The fussillade began anew. Thiers and Barrot, hastened into the streets to assure the people that they were in power, and Lamoriciere in Command of the National Guard. For a moment, there was a hope of returning calm. I met a procession which though only meaning to make a peaceful display of its triumph, was of fearful aspect, first came a detachment of the National Guard, then a body of students. Young men again. Those named before were of the very lowest class. These were of the highest, but they had been doing the same work as the others, and at that moment, looked just as savage. Following these was a host of men, some with blouses and some without One blouser was surmounted by a splendid military cap, another was decked with the trappings of a cavalry officer, against another dangled a beautiful sword, beneath another shone scarlet military pantgloons, over another was drawn an officer's coat. Some bore muskets wrested from the troops. Some fowling pieces taken from gentlemen's houses. Some bars of iron wrenched from church palings. Some rusty pikes recovered from long idleness. And all bore marks of fierce passion and conscious of victory. They sang the Marseillaise, shouted vive.

Lamoriciere, said the people had got all they wished. Just then, one corpse was carried after another Gentlemen thank God that you have never seen the change which passes upon a man of passionate sympathies, when, during a civil struggle he sees one of his town's men shot dead. Men whom he had seen a moment before standing at the doors, quietly looking on, become possessed with fury at the sight of those corpse. What had now occurred. The new ministry had ordered the troops to retire and the firing to cease. National Guards and others went to a post, of some twenty five municipal guards, on the place de la, Concorde and required, them in consequence of this order to lay down their arms. They fired on the National guards, were attacked in return, and in a few seconds, only one of their number survived. Going up to a post of a National guard, I said I hope all is over now. Ah sir, we honed so a few minantes ago, but they have fired on our national guards, and we do not know how that will end.

Thus we present our readers the third series of this fearful tragic scene From battle and murder, famine and sudden death, good Lord deliver us [illegible] S

Mr Editor:

You asked me to give you some account of our expedition to Little Cape Mount. I promised to do so—and now sit down to redeem my promise —Permit me in the first place to state, that as I was a volunteer and had no standing in the army, the Commander-in-chief honored me with the post of Aid to his Excellency; and in the second, to add that Colonel Mc Gill, imposed upon me the further duties and dignity of Chaplain to the forces

We embarked on board the Lark and Pedlar on Tuesday the first day of March. By 11 o'clock A. M we were under way, beating up the coast, against both wind & current. The crowded state of the vessel was such as that the sight of would have caused any man to faint, who had fully made up his mind to be pleased, at all hazards and despite of inconvenience and discomfort. As this determination was ours—a determination growing out of the importance and necessity of the measure, and of the unavoidable inability of our government to provide these commodious and comfortable transports that convey the forces of other nations, while the sick lay rolling, groaning and casting up, now a muted half-glazed eye—and now their accounts, the more favored of old Neptune indulged a joke at their expense, and indulged their appetites at the expense of their well stocked chests.

Early on the following morning the Lark was ready to land her detachment. The Pedlar was still in the rear some ten or twelve miles; & a light head-wind, or no wind at all, promised to keep her there during the day. We were ready to land at 6 P. M. but an angry cloud in the north-east threatned a blow. This caused a delay, but about 7 the cloud veered to the east, poured down its floods, in the midst of which, we started for the beach. Colonel Mc Gill went with the first boat to superintend the landing. Two or three natives were seen on the shore exhibiting some thing which we supposed to be, intended for a flag-of-truce. The surf was very bad—too much so to permit the boats to approach it. They lay a distance off and the men were taken ashore in canoes. Before the first boat had been discharged I started for the shore. No mishap had yet happened to the canoes. Anxious to be landed dry, I offered the kroomen a dooner of an extra twenty five cents to put me ashore dry. I go carry you good, was the reply, which was hardly uttered when a large swell combed into the canoe filled and sunk her. I was however soon on shore in all the comfort a good soaking and the further comfort of a prospect of remaining so through the day. Soon afterwards the President landed, and by one o'clock all the men were landed.

Prince Cain had arrived. Not long afterward the renowned Boombo also made his appearance. He made a shuffling apology for his delay in meeting us. We told him we had come to set the palaver, wished him to shew us the way to the barricade. He said the officers might go to the town but the men must remain on the beach. The President replied promptly and firmly that officers and men would occupy the town—and requested him to get in the boat which was ready to take him up the river. He became very much alarmed—suspecting no doubt that it was a scheme to put him on board the Lark. He attempted to escape and his retrograde movements was arrested only by an unequivocal demonstration of an officer with his rifle.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Herald:

Please give a place in your columns to the following lines upon the general interests of Temperance in the Republic of Liberia.

That the principles of temperance are indispensably necessary to be reduced to practical application in the affairs of church and state, and in every public good in order to prosperity, advancement, and high respect and renown, will scarcely be doubted or questioned with any degree of success. In order, therefore, to promote this general benefit; there was established in Monrovia, a few months since, an institution which takes the name of, "The Rising Sun Grand Division No. 1. of the Independent Order of the Sons of Temperance, of Liberia, Bros; A. Miller, G. W. P., J. L. Benedict, G. W. A., J. W. Hilton, G. R. S. A. F. Johns, G. T

Subsequently the Grand Division chartered a subordinate Division for Monrovia by the name of "Union Subordinate Division No; 1." with a full set of officers. And subsequent to that the Grand Division through the G. W. P. acting in person, formed and chartered in Greenville Sinoe, a branch by name of "Morning Star Subordinate Division No 2 with a full set of officers At the last meeting of the order in this place it was resolved that Bro: Jno: Hanson, D. G. W. P. be empowered to form a branch in Edina, Grand Cassa, to be assisted therein by Bro: J. G. Thompson. It was also Resolved that the order celebrate the 26th July ensuing, the sixth anniversary of the independence of Liberia.

It is hoped that, as a stand has now been taken in favor of temperance, it will be maintained, until, the ball of temperance rolling onward and spreading, the pure principles of this order shall fill Liberia, and breaking from this radiant point shall furnish its ample quota in redeeming a sunken continent.

Arise, then, young men of Liberia and unite heartily and cordially in helping forward the efforts now being set on foot to reclaim Liberia, and the continent—and the world to the principles and practices of temperance.

Respectfully submitted.

A Son of Temperance.

Expedition to Little Cape Mount

Mr. Editor!—

Having just returned from Little Cape Mount, with the military expedition, which set out for that place some days ago—we beg a space in your paper for the brief detail of certain of the occurrences—the reading of which will, perhaps, not be entirely devoid of interest to your readers.—Before we proceed, allow us to remark that we deem it unnecessary here to recite the circumstances which led to the raising of the expedition, as every reader of your paper, must be familiar with them.

It was determined that the expedition should start on the 1st inst: accordingly the necessary preparations having been made, early on the morning of the 1st, there was quite an excitement in town. The beating of drums and the going to and fro of men armed and equipped, brought a large concourse of people to the "muster grounds" where the soldiers were gathered with their knapsacks—and glittering muskets ready for the march After the roll was called and the usual preparations made we marched to the beach followed by a crowd of spectators, among whom we noticed several of those gentle forms—who, by their "tender and heart endearing sympathy," inspire, in a remarkable degree the patriotism and bravery of the sterner sex. Having arrived at the beach we formed in line, at the command of the officers, and made ready for embarkation. While embarking, some of us, being mere recruits, and handling ourselves rather awkwardly, could not escape a drenching But we got off safely As the boat pushed off from the shore several cheers were given by the soldiers, which were promptly responded to by the spectators on the beach We reached the "Lark" in safety. As soon as we got on board we were directed to lay aside our muskets and knapsacks, which being done, we felt considerably relieved. The vessel set sail about 12 o'clock, M. Many of us soon discovered that we were not seamen—for we were annoyed by the taxing of Neptune —sea-sickness. From which we suffered very much.

Having made a pretty fair progress we arrived off Little Cape Mount about 8. o'clock P. M. and were obliged to sleep on board that night. Though we lay at anchor still the incessant motion of the vessel rendered the victims of Neptune exceedingly inconvenienced. Next morning the sufferings of the people appeared more intense, and while many were relieving themselves of the "uncomfortable contents," a gentleman of our acquaintance who stood by observing their sufferings, and no doubt partaking of them himself—exclaimed — "Al my sweets have been mingled with bitters, but I have tasted bitters, which partook of no sweets at all,"—alluding, probably, to the inconvenience which he was then experiencing. As soon as it was light enough to see the beach, we descried a white flag—ensign of peace flying on the shore. Arrangements were soon made for landing the troops. The large boats were employed to convey them to the shore, but so great was the turbulence of the waters at the beach that it was thought impossible for the boats to approach it without being smashed. It was found necessary therefore to use two canoes, to receive the men from the boats, which anchored a little distance from the beach, and carry them to the shore. While landing, the strictest care was observed—two persons only being allowed to go in a canoe at a time. But notwithstanding all the diligence exercised the insults of the angry surges could not be prevented.—nay, their boisterous waters seemed to baffle the dexterity of the most expert krooman. After a few hours of toil however, the men were all landed from the "Lark." The troops having arrived safely at the shore, the President dispatched a messenger to Boombo's town, situated on the right bank of the Little Cape Mount river, a few miles from its mouth—to invite Boombo and Geo: Cain to meet him on the beach. These two men are said to be the instigators of all that carnage and bloodshed lately produced in the Golah and Dey Countries. They promptly obeyed the invitation and came with the messenger. But it is evident that they did not expect to find so large a company of armed men as they did, from the expression of surprise which the countenance of Boombo assumed as he approached the soldiers whose glittering bayonets rendered their appearance at once grand and terrible The President had ordered the first and third companies under command of Lieut: Col Mc Gill to march to the town, while he with his Aid de Camp and a few armed men—would proceed with Boombo and George Cain by way of the river While the boat was being prepared, Boombo, becoming suspicious of the movements of the President appeared restless and uneasy, and feigning himself sick, urged various objections against going in the boat, and requested that he might be sent on before—a plan upon which he felt no doubt, to secure his elopement. But the President insisted upon his entering the boat, speaking peremptorily, so that notwithstanding all the reluctance of Boombo, both he and his associate George Cain, were induced to get into the boat The first and third companies then started for the town, with strict orders not to enter into it until the President with the other part of the men arrived Soon afterwards the second and fourth companies under command of Major Erskine took up a line of march

Respectfully yours,

EDWARD W. B.

For the Vice Presidency.

The partiality, of my fellow citizens in different parts of the Republic in conventional capacities, has nominated me a candidate for the Vice Presidency. Our respect to which as requested to accept, prompts me hereby to tender the offer in the most unfeigned acceptance & grateful acknowledgements. Yet I have not sought, nor strenuously refused the prospect of such distinction. Not any office within the Republic could pecuniarily compensate for the suspension of my business. But the chief offices should not be inviting for emolument, or for that which is considered the impetus in ordinary avocations. But for the establishment of those virtues, in every case, too high to be bought, and too valuable to be sold for silver or gold. The ways are so many for spending money in support of those honors that few men would want to make effort s to remain longer in office than four years. Not any matter how well the Executive functions may have been wielded, sound Republican policy suggests that custom, which is common law, should limit the Presidential term of service nor beyond four years in the same hands for the good of the people

Without envy on the part of any, the balance of power should always be held convertable at will, without many restraints in the hands of the people. Who ought not to be less well versed in the science of self-government than any one of its public servants is skilled in its theory and practice. Otherwise the scale might turn and the servant take the place of the master of the people. For history and experience teach that man is but man, and therefore, at best estate fallible 'Caution is the parent of safty.' Under Divine Providence, this Republic is destined to be perfected and enlarged into the great future home of the oppressed exile of our race, now interspersed over foreign lands. Whose benign influences, with ours, must reclaim the heathen of this great Peninsula from his moral night. For, verily, we owe the duty both to God and our degraded race, to make it the most acceptable and desirable, Religious and civil home in the World. We owe much of our importance to success in the attainment of these great and noble ends. Let us do our duty as responsible agents in the work.

Very respectfully submitted to the conventions their officials and fellow citizens.

By your obt servt.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MARCH 16th, 1853.

In our last number we noticed the departure of His Excellency, President Roberts, with an armed force for the territory of Little Cape Mount The readers of the "Herald" will recollect, that on more than one occasion, we have referred to the unsettled state of that country, caused by the aggressions of Boombo, one of the Chiefs of the country. So determined was this Chieftain to lay waste with fire and sword, every town and village within two days walk of his barricaded towns, that he actually sent his warriors across the Little Cape Mount river, into the Dey country, and caused two of the principal towns of the inoffensive Deys to be burned down —many of the inhabitants to be cruelly butchered —scores of them to be carried into captivity; and the factories of our merchants robbed of their contents. The quantity of rice and other property destroyed by this ruthless Chieftain is very great. Boombo was bound by solemn obligations to demean himself in accordance with the laws of Liberia, and under no considerations, was he to engage in war, unless authorized by our government. To every message sent to him by the Authorities reminding him of his engagements with the Government, and requiring him to put an end to his wars, he returned evasive answers, indeed at one time, his reply to the Government was insulting On one hand, the natives were loudly calling on the Government to stop the marauding career of Boombo, and on the other hand, our merchants were uttering their complaints.—There was but one course to pursue; and President Roberts adopted it, hence, the expedition was set on foot. George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, was at Little Cape Mount when the President arrived there, and as the President preferred that the examination of all the matters should take place in Monrovia, he determined to bring Cain and Boombo with him: - but Cain contrived to make his escape, and sent word that he would be here in six days—he has not yet arrived. Boombo and about fifty three other prisoners, were brought here, and we presume they will have to stand a regular trial.

The President and a part of the armed force returned on the 7th:, and those who came by land reached home on the 8th.

It is supposed by all, that if Boombo is justly dealt with, it is not probable that any of his followers will attempt to revive disturbances in any country so immediately in the neighborhood of our settlements, as is Little Cape Mount to Monrovia.

In our next, we will give the result of the investigation of Boombo's case. It is now pretty generally known that George Cain has all along been the foremost in encouraging Boombo in his aggressions.

The New York Colonization Journal, says that Frederick Douglass, the great champion of immediate abolition of slavery in the United States and consequently an enemy of African Colonization and of Liberia, has recently come out in favor of Liberia, and now edits a paper recommending the colored people of America to come to Liberia Well done Mr. Douglass,' it is never too late to do good. We could have told you long since that you were wrong in your oppinion of Liberia, and that eventually, you would regret, the stern opposition, you have always shown to it.

We remember having seen it stated in an American Paper, "that the Americo Liberians, instead of exerting a wholesome influence upon the aboriginees of our land, exercised a tendency of a different character; and that the natives were not disposed to change their customs to please their civilized neighbors" In some respects this may be true. It was never pretended that the adult natives were readily disposed to abandon their long established habits, and adopted those of a different kind—still instances are not uncommon where such are known to be the case In every village in Liberia, there are scores of adult natives who have abandoned the superstitious rites and ceremonies of their fathers, and assumed those of civilization. In fact, so complete is the reformation in some cases, that a stranger, on visiting some of our towns and villages, will not be able to discriminate between those born in America, and those born and reared amidst the most degraded of heathenish idolatry.

The Bark Shirley cleared from this port on the 16th. inst. for Baltimore. She carried a large cargo of produce, worth nearly $ 30,000 and bills of exchange and other remittances amounting to about $ 12.000—more. It is stated by those who ought to know, that the produce and other available funds sent by this vessel will amount to forty five thousand dollars. Large lots of camwood and palm oil were marked, weighed and gauged to go by this vessel, but were left behind, as every part of her was well stored, and not a other ton could be got in her.

Immigrants. The immigrants are geting on through the acclimating process finely Numbers of them are settled at Millsburg, and most of them have drawn their lands. The Millsburg Settlement since the addition to its population by late arrivals of immigrants, extends up the St. Pauls nearly three miles, and farm lands in the neighborhood of Millsbur, have recently been sold for four and five dollars per acre—which is an advance in price of nearly one hundred per cent.

HUMAN HAIR.

The hair may be called the offspring of the skin; and in health and disease, youth and age, there is a close sympathy between the two. fine growth of hair when magnified, might be compared to a plantation of osiers, when the leaves are off; with some difference, of course. Human hair is not perfectly round, as it seems to be when seen with the naked eye; nor is it of the same thickness through its whole length. At its origin in the skin it swells out into a bulbous form, like a crocus root, or the body of a young onion, befor the leaves have opened From this base the hair springs forth, and gradually becomes bulkier as it lengthens. This goes on to a certain point, at which the greater growth is attained; and then the hair grows fine by degrees and beautifully less; until, if allowed its full growth as on the head of a young damsel, its point is many times smaller and more delicate than the portion near the centre of its length. Some hair is much rounder, more cylindrical, than others; some being oval, and some flattened. The flat hair it is that curls most Adonis and the * * * are, therefore, alike in one point at least Hairs vary very much, both in thickness and in length; those on the female scalp being, naturally, the longest of all; and those of the beard of men, being next in length, and longer than those of the male head. The hair of the female scalp is not only longer than that of the male, but, in proportion to its length, is larger in diameter. The thickest of all human hair, however, is that of the beard of men; and the investigations of this subject tend to justify the assertion of the barbers, that frequently cutting and shaving the hair has a tendency to make it thicker. Every hair has a stem and a root, just as a tree has; the root being bedded in the skin just as the tree is in the earth. But the comparison does not end here. The tree has bark, medulla and intervening substance; the hair has the same. The bark (or cortex) of the hair displays a series of scales placed, one overlapping another, just as we see tiles overlap on a house top. Immediately below this scaly bark we have a fibrous portion, forming two thirds of the bulk of the hair. These fibres are seen to seperate when the hair splits from being too long uncut The centre of the hair has a little canal, full of an oily, marrow-like substance, containing the greater part of the coloring matter; black in black hair, brown in brown hair, and almost absent when the hair has become gray. The marrow of the hair, and its two outer coatings, are well seen in a section of a hair from a well-saved chin. The razor, day by day, cuts it across; it cannot grow longer so it grows thicker and stronger; and each slice taken away by the matutinal shave, looks, under the microscope, like a section of bone; just as a bone is cut across when a ham is cut up into slices for broiling; whilst the stump remaining on the chin has just the same look as the bone on the section of grilled ham ready for breakfast. The primly shaved mouth is thickly dotted round by myriads of hideous hair stumps, with inner layer and marrow all exposed. Fashion ever since the days of Louis Quatorze, has demanded the daily sacrifice, and even continue to pay it. Happily they do not see the stumps of their beards through a microscope, or razor makers would starve.—Southern Baptist

JEWS' RESTORATION TO PALESTINE.—A meeting, on the subject of restoring Palestine to the Jews, took place recently, at the Mechanics' Institute, Gould-square The utmost good will, zeal, unanimous attachment to the cause prevailed. A resolution was unanimous adopted, declaratory of the importance of the subject: and, after some discussion, the meeting was adjourned, preparatory to convening an early public meeting of the friends to the cause, to adopt the most expedient means for the accomplishment of this holy cause. A liberal subscription was entered into.—Jewish Chronicle

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, Messrs Hyde, Hodge &co. of London, contractors with Her Britannic Majesty's Government, to furnish Laborers from the African Coast, for the West Indies, have sent some of their ships to the coast of the Republic, offering an advance of Ten Dollars for every person who may be induced to emigrate:—And, whereas, the extinction of the slave trade have left large numbers of predial and other laborers in the possession of the Chiefs, and principal men of the country.—While the offer of Ten Dollars each, is nearly equivalent to the amount formerly paid for slaves, during the prevalence of the Slave Trade, and which operated mainly in producing and sustaining the wars, by which the country was distracted.—And, whereas, certain refractory Chiefs are reported to have engaged with the Agents of said Company, to furnish a number of Laborers, and are further known to have in concealment near Grand Cape Mount, a number of the unhappy victims of their predatory excursions.—And; Whereas, complaint has been made to the Government that persons are held to be sent off without their voluntary consent, or the consent of their natural guardians:—Therefore, to prevent the abuses and evils which might otherwise result from the enterprise:

Be it known by this Proclamation, to all whom it may concern, that the law regulating Passports must be strictly observed—that vessels carrying, or intending to carry away emigrants, must come to this port with their emigrants on board, to obtain passports—in order that an opportunity may be presented to the Government to ascertain whether the emigration be free or constrained. Every violation of the law regulating passports, will be visited with the utmost penalty of the law, in that case made and provided.

If poverty wretchedness, vice and murder is allowed to run riot through the land the constitution would be violated! Verily, we are a jealous people.—The news

"PATIENT CONTINUANCE IN WELL-DOING."

Bear the burden of the present—
Let the morrow bear its own;
If the morning sky be pleasant,
Why the coming night bemoan?

If the darkened heavens lower,
Wrap thy cloak around thy form;
Though the tempest rise in power,
God is mightier than the storm.

Steadfast faith and hope unshaken
Animate the trusting breast;
Step by step the journey's taken
Nearer to the land of rest.

All unseen, the Master walketh
By the toiling servant's side;
Comfortable words he talketh,
While his hands uphold and guide.

Grief nor pain, nor any sorrow,
Rends thy breast, to him unknown;
He to-day, and He to-morrow,
Grace sufficient gives his own.

Holy strivings nerve and strengthen—
Long endurance wins the crown;
When the evening shadows lengthen,
Thou shall lay the burden down.

TWO CHAPTERS ON TOBACCO.

BY AN ANTI.

Do not be offended, dear lady reader, with this subject, nor with the present writer upon it, for not one word is he going to say in its favor; on the other hand, he entirely takes your side of the question, and will adopt the strongest language you can find to oppose it. Nothing vexes him more than the fact that while a great deal of effort is made to stop dram-drinking, the dirty pipe, the vulgar cigar, the vile quid—poison all, are encouraged, yes, relished by thousands who cry out poison in reference to alcohol, and tremble at the very idea of a glass of wine. The use and progress of tobacco is a singular phenomenon in the history of the human family; and proves how mankind will prefer the most disgusting and nauseous drug, provided it exert a narcotic or stimulating influence over the nerves, to the most nutritous and wholesome food, though it may be as palatable as it is valuable

We repeat it, that this plant of tobacco is essentially poisonous. If from its leaves you extract an empyreumatic oil, a single drop of it will cause an animal to die in horrible convulsions. The plant is more poisonous than henbane; is unpleasant in smell, nauseous in taste, and produces giddiness and colic to those who partake of it, till they become accustomed to its use, and then, under its fascinating influence, they delight in the poison.

The old writers say that the name of tobacco was given to it by the Spaniards, from the isle of Tobago, one of the Caribbees, where it was produced in great abundance; but the moderns, always of course the wisest, scout this representation, and say, with Humboldt, that it was the term used in the Haytien language to designate the pipe or smoking instrument, and that by an error of the Spaniards in transferring the name of the pipe to the herb itself, the mistake has originated.

Where it originated who knows? The Chinese, as usual, claim the highest antiquity for its use among them, and pretend to have smoked it for many ages; and the inhabitants of the Emerald Isle contend that the plant was in use in their country in the tenth century, but this has also very properly been called a Pickwickian story. It seems pretty certain that in 1492, Columbus observed the practice of smoking among the Indians of Cuba and Hispaniola; and that they lighted the leaves of the herb with a torch for a perfume. He and his companions, however, very properly considered it a barbarous practice. According to Camden, in the year 1586, the art of smoking through the pipe was first introduced to the Europeans by one Ralph Lane, who accompanied the expedition under Sir Francis Drake. Sir Walter Raleigh, however, had the merit, or rather demerit, of rendering the habit fashionable, for it is said that he was not only an inveterate smoker himself, but a grower of the plant, which he introduced at the same time. It had scarcely taken root, however, on British soil, when it was met by a denunciatory edict from the Court of the Virgin Queen. In Camden's Memoir of that sovereign, he thus complains, "that men used tobacco every where, some for wantonness, some for health-sake, and that with insatiable desire and greediness, they sucked the stinking smoke thereof through earthen pipes, which they blew out again through their noses, so that Englishmen's bodies were so delighted with the plant, that they seemed, as it were, desecrated into barbarians." Parkenson in 1629 says of tobacco—"With us it is cherished as well for the medicinal qualities, as for the beauty of its flowers;" not a word about smoking. Gerarde, in 1633, though he knows "the dry leaves are used to be taken in a pipe, set on fire, and suckt into the stomache, and thrust forth against the nosthrils," yet "commends the syrrup above this fume or smoky medicine."

At a very early period we find tobacco by far too generally used in this county. We greatly fear that even the fathers indulged, to some extent at least, in its use. Certainly in Virginia, it was extensively cultivated, and sold very cheap; for the records of that State, as far back as 1644 present an item made by a church warden, "to paid Mr. Mallory for preaching 2 funeral sermons, 800 pounds of tobacco." A minister's annual salary was 80,000 pounds of tobacco. But now let our lady friends look at our next statement, and tell us whether there may not very properly be an aversion to it founded on its past use, and on the very low estimate in which they were held by its cultivators. Let them read, and pronounce it "a filthy weed."

Holmes, in his American Annals, tells us that —the enterprising colonists being generally destitute of families, Sir Edward Sandys, the treasurer, proposed to the Virginia company to send over a freight of young women to become wives for the planters. The proposal was applauded; and ninety girls "young and uncorrupt," were sent over in the ships, that arrived this year [1620] and the year following sixty more handsome and well recommended to the company for their virtues, education, and demeanor. The price of a wife at the first was one hundred pounds of tobacco: but as the numbers became scarce the price was increased to one hundred and fifty pounds, the value of which in money, was three shillings per pound. This debt for wives, it was ordered, should have the precedency of all other debts, and be the first recoverable.

Only think, now, of a hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, at the highest price, for a young virtuous, beautiful lady, and four hundred pounds for a sermon, probably not worth hearing. No wonder the young planters were so eager to obtain wives. This was really so; for another author says in reference to this novel trade,—"It would have done a man's heart good to see the gallant young Virginians hastening to the waters edge, when a ship arrived from London, each carrying a bundle of the best tobacco under his arm, and each taking back with him a beautiful and virtuous young wife."

But tobacco was by no means universally esteemed in the North American Colonies. One of the most remarkable laws in the infancy of Connecticut was aimed against its use. Let us transcribe it:

"TOBACKO.

"Forasmuch as it is observed, that many abuses are crept in, and committed by frequent taking of tobacko:

"It is ordered by the authority of this Courte, that no person under the age of twenty-one years, nor any other, that hath not already accustomed himself to the use thereof, shall take any tobacko, until he hath brought certificate under the hands of some who are approved for knowledge and skill in phisick, that it is useful for him, and also that he hath received a lycense from the Courte, for the same. And for the regulation of those, who either by their former taking it, have to their owne apprehensions, made it necessary to them, or upon due advice, are persuaded to the use thereof:

"It is ordered, That no man within this Colonye, after the publication hereof, shall take any tobacko, publiquely, in the streetes, highways, or any barne yards, or uppon trainning dayes, in any open places, under the penalty of sixpence for each offence against this order, in any the perticulars thereof, to bee paid without gainesaying uppon conviction, by the testimony of one witness, that is without just exception, before any one magistrate. And the constables, in the several townes, are required to make presentment to each particular Courte, of such as they understand, and can evict to bee transgressors of this order." A similar denunciation was fulminated in Massachusetts. It enacted, that no person under the age of twenty, nor any other not habituated to it should use it but under the same regulations as in Connecticut, and farther, those who had addicted themselves to this obnoxious weed, were prohibited from using it in company, at their labor, or on their travels, unless they were at least ten miles from a house; and then only once a day, under a penalty of sixpence for each offence; of which, the constables were directed to give information to the district court.

In addition to these laws, others still more severe have in different nations opposed it. The Pope once issued his bull against it; the magistrates of Transylvania punished its culture with confiscation; a king of Persia forbade it under pain of death; the corporation of Boston still fine every man seen smoking in the streets, (?) and the grand duke of Moscow forbade it under penalty of the loss of the nose. This last appears to be the most appropriate punishment — Christian Watchman and Reflector.

JAPAN: ITS PEOPLE.

The people of Japan are Mongolians, a race that is generally considered inferior to the Caucasian, though next to it in the scale of superiority. The chief portion of the inhabitants of Asia belong to this stock of the human family. China is almost exclusively occupied by them. They appear to be a race that has advanced to a certain point, but is incapable of popular progress. The civilization of the Celestial Empire, for example, has remained stationary since the dawn of authentic history. Such as Marco Paolo found it, nearly five hundred years back, such it is to this day, and such it is described by Chinese authors as having been two thousand years ago. Jealousy of foreigners seems also to be a feature of every Mongolian power. It is visible in Turkey, on the extreme west, as in Japan, on the furthest coast. Wherever, in fact, the Mongolian has settled, there the peculiar characteristics of his blood are apparent in his laws and institutions.

This is strikingly verified in the many points of resemblance between the Turks and Japanese, though the former, for centuries, have been in civilized Europe, and may be supposed to be modified more or less by its influence. In both Japan and Turkey a despotic government exists, which does not, however, rule directly, over all districts as a Russian Czar but controls the provinces through subordinate despots, who govern comparatively free from the central power. The independent princes of Japan, and the pachas of the Turkish empire are substantially the same kind of officers. In another respect the two governments resemble each other. Though nominally absolute, they are really checked by numerous customs, precedents, and laws, which are as despotic over them, as they are apparently over the people. It is well known that the late innovations of Sultan Mahmoud came near producing the dissolution of the empire, so obstinately were his Mongolian subjects opposed to the radical changes he introduced. Even yet the Sublime Porte is governed, to a greater extent than any European despotism by routine. Japan is emphatically a duplicate of Turkey in this respect. A thousand ancient precedents control the action of the ruler, even in the most trivial affairs. Like the Sultan, the Japanese emperor has his vizier, his council, and the other features in which Mongolian governments differ from European ones.

The customs of the two populations equally resemble each other. In Turkey, if a public servant fa ls under the displeasure of the Sultan, he meekly receives the bow string sent to him, and dies without a word. In Japan, a governor, or other officer, who offends, rips up his bowels, becoming, in like manner, his own executioner. Social habits are, in many particulars, the same among both people. If a visit is paid in Turkey, pipes and coffee are introduced; if a visit is paid in Japan, it is pipes and tea. If old narratives are to be believed, for the Japanese have had no wars for two centuries, the two nations exhibit the same enthusiasm and desperate valor in battle. We might pursue the parallel, but we have said enough to show how much the Turks and Japanese resemble each other, a fact necessary to be remembered in forming a correct estimate of the latter, for, finding them so much alike in these respects where we know the peculiarities of each, we can rationally conclude that they are similar in other particulars also. The stubborn fanaticism with which the Turks resisted, for so many centuries, the influence of European civilization, will, in this view, throw no little light on what may be expected from Japan. In a word, we must remember that we are dealing with Mongolians, and not with the less prejudiced Caucasians.

The Japanese appear, however, to be the best of their race. All travellers agree in describing them as superior to the Chinese physically, if not intellectually and morally also. The same high sense of honor which distinguishes the hardier natives of Europe from the effeminate ones of Asia generally characterizes the Japanese as distinguished from his neighbor of China. They are, in truth a frank, honest, manly race. The people appear also to be less exclusive than their government. Prisoners have usually received kindness from the inhabitants, even when the ruling powers have treated them the most harshly. The virtue of the women is proverbial, for a faithless wife, it is said, is almost unknown in Japan. The men, however, like their Turkish brethren, are less remarkable for continence. It is a strong proof of the advanced condition comparatively of Japan in civilization, that the females are not subject to the same restrictions as in other Asiatic nations.

So interesting a people ought to be better known and should live in closer amity with the rest of mankind. We trust, therefore, that the expedition of Com. Perry will be successful, not only for commercial reasons, but for others. But the more we examine the subject, the less brilliant appears the picture.—Presbyterian Banner.

JEWISH PRINCIPLE.

The Jews sometimes display lofty principles which show that the divine light exists among them, although frequently concealed by the old incrustations of Rabbinical institutions. In my own family, an interesting and characteristic incident occurred. My worthy grandfather was a man of great sensibility and of a warm heart, but easily excited to wrath. He had a brother whom he dearly loved. One day they fell into a dispute, and each returned to his home in anger. This happened on a Friday. As the evening drew near, my good grandmother, who was another Martha, full of activity, began to make preparation for the Sabbath day. "Come, dear Joseph," she exclaimed, "the night is approaching; come, and light the Sabbath lamp!"

But he, full of sadness and anguish, continued walking up and down in the room. His good wife spoke again in anxiety: "See, the stars are already shining in the firmament of the Lord, and our Sabbath lamp is not yet lighted."

Then my grandfather took his hat and cane, and, evidently much troubled, hastened out of the house. But in a few moments he returned with tears of joy in his eyes.

"Now, dear Rebecca," he exclaimed, "now I am ready."

He repeated his prayer, and with gladness lighted the Sabbath lamp. Then he related the dispute which had occured in the morning, adding: "I could not pray and light my lamp before becoming reconciled with my brother Isaac."

"But how did you manage to do it so soon?"

"O," he replied, "Isaac had been as much troubled as I was; he could not begin the Sabbath either, without becoming reconciled with me. So we met in the street; he was coming to me, and I was going to him, and we ran into each other's arms, and wept."

Might not we lend this anecdote with those simple words of Jesus, "Go and do likewise?"—Watchman and Reflector.

A HEATHEN GODDESS.

We trust that our young readers, after reading the following description by D. Scudder, will be more than ever thankful that they have the knowledge of the true God, whose name and nature is love; and that they will cheerfully do what they can to make him known to the children of distant heathen lands:—

"From the images made of her, it would appear that she is of a black or dark blue color. She has four arms. In one hand she hold a sword, and in another a human head. Her hair is disheveled, reaching down to her feet. Her countenance is most ferocious. Her tongue comes out of her mouth and hangs over her chin. She has three eyes, red and fiery. Her lips and eyebrows are streaked with blood. She has two dead bodies for earrings, and wears a girdle around her loins—a girdle made of bloody hands, which she cut off from the bodies of her enemies. She has a necklace of skulls, which she took from the bodies of the giants and others killed by her.

Of all the Hindoo divinities, this goddess is the most cruel and revengeful. Different acts of worship are performed to appease her. If, for example, a devotee should burn his body, by applying a burning lump to it, it would be very pleasing to her. If he should draw some of his blood and give it to her, or if he should cut off a piece of his flesh and offer it as a burnt offering, she would be still more pleased."—Home and Foreing Journal

The entire amount of the receipts of the Duke of Wellington for his services was nearly three millions of pounds sterling. The emoluments of the Duke's sons, nephews, sons-in-law, and other relatives, from the army, the church and the pension list are enormous.

Expedition to Little Cape Mount.

Mr. Editor!—

The road to the town lay through a flat and unpleasant region—being a continual succession of swamps and marshes. We travelled on, for about three hours, until having arrived within two miles of the town, the companies were ordered to "halt" by the side of the river to receive the President, with Boombo and George Cain, who, owing to the shoals in the river had not yet arrived at the town. The Vey Chiefs being placed in the line, the companies continued to the town—where we found Col. Mc Gill, who with the companies under his charge,—had waited for us by the side of the river overgainst the barricade. The gates being opened, we entered the town. Before 9 o'clock P. M. we were all as comfortably situated, as might be expected, in our quarters. This town is remarkably fortified, being surrounded by a barricade impassable to any native force. It consist of four tiers of posts closely set into the ground and of almost insurmountable altitude. Between each row a space of twenty feet intervenes. This fortification appeared wonderful to me—and as I gazed upon the massive structure, I could not but admire the inventive genius of the natives, and reflect upon the unfairness of those who represent the native African as naturally indolent, and living in a state of ease and supineness. The town itself, however, is not so large a one as I expected to find within so formidable a barricade. It contains probably about 100 huts build so closely together, as to render the heat almost insupportable. There are numerous narrow passages between them, intersecting each other at irregular distances, frequently resembling one of a labyrinth—and often was I at a loss to find my quarters. Owing to the reluctance which Boombo had manifested to obey the President's orders on the beach and his suspicious movements in the town, it was thought advisable to place him under arrest—the opinion being prevallent that if an opportunity offered he would escape. He was accordingly placed under the care of a strong guard, and was not allowed to go anywhere unaccompained by them. On one occasion under a specious pretence he requested to be allowed to go out of the barricade. His request being granted he was placed under the charge of the whole of the 1st Company—which the Chief observing, and being unwilling to be attended by so terrible an escort, withdrew his petition and contented himself with remaining within the barricade. This circumstance aroused still more our suspicions which were confirmed on the evening of the day following, when, during a heavy storm, the cunning Chief having denuded and greased himself attempted an escape—but he was apprehended, while in the act of climbing the barricade, and placed under a double guard.

Messengers having been dispatched for Dwarlobeh and Tom Gum—and other chiefs of the Golah and Dey tribes, which have suffered so considerably from the cruelty of Boombo and his allies—they came. As soon as Boombo had learned, that these men—his inveterate enemies, were in his town, he became strongly agitated with anger, and could not conceal his emotions which produced from him some of the most ugly grimaces that I have ever seen mar the human features. The chiefs now being convoked the "palaver" was discussed for about two days, when it was judged necessary to assemble them at Monrovia, in order to have a more full discussion and satisfactory decision. The Golah and Dey chiefs were, in consequence dismissed with orders to meet at Monrovia—Boombo could not be thus trusted, he was therefore taken in charge by a strong guard, on board the "Pedlar"—which lay in the river, opposite the town. It was the intention of the President to bring George Cain, the accomplice of Boombo also in the vessel, but through his subtilty he escaped, on the very morning on which it had been decided to start. The President therefore determined to bring away certain hostages—from the town—several men being disarmed were taken and sent on board the "Lark." As the Lark was now pretty well crowded, the whole army could not conveniently return to Monrovia in her; it was therefore thought advisable that some of the men, who desired it should return by land: several for various reasons preferred walking, but not a few before they arrived at Monrovia, regretted that they had undertaken the tedious jaunt. I was among the number who chose to walk—and though I suffered considerably from fatigue &c. still I feel myself amply repaid—by the scenes which I witnessed—and the experience I gained in the wearisome route

Respectfully yours,

Expedition to Little Cape Mount.

Mr. Editor!—

In our last communication in relation to the expedition to Little Cape Mount, we deferred the detail of the incidents of our journey homeward to your present number. We now solicit a space in your paper for it. The excursion was not so pleasant a one as we had anticipated. We started from the left bank of the Little Cape Mount river immediately after the embarkation of the hostages taken from Boombo's town—of whom mention was made in our last—which was about 9 o'clock A. M. Instead of making directly for the beach our guides preferred taking the road through the country. We had not proceeded far in the narrow path through which we travelled, before we came to an extensive plain covered with grass—with here and there a large tree—bearing a strong resemblance to an American orchard. The prospect before us appeared boundless—but it was truly charming. We took no time however to stop and admire, but onward we went, and, after a wearisome jaunt, we again entered the dense woods, and were obliged, once more, to proceed "single file." Having gone a little distance we again entered a grassy plain—whose appearance was no less beautiful than the former. We passed through this also, and soon found ourselves in the midst of a dense sasbarry overhanging a miserable path, which offered obstructions at almost every step. Through this road we had to find our way as well as we could, frequently were we obliged to stop and remove the impediments which had been placed in the road by those natives who escaping from the enemy, had obstructed the path in order to avoid being successfully pursued. This passed us through a varied and diversified scenes—some unpleasant and others agreeable to our feelings. We proceeded up hills and down into valleys. Now we stood upon most delightful eminences, and now we descended into horrible dells. We waded a considerable distance before we came to any water, and were almost famishing from thirst, when, suddenly, we lighted upon a gentle stream—but only those who were in front enjoyed the luxury—for the others rushing with impatient violence upon the water rendered it so turbid as to be unfit for drinking:—But it was not long before we came to a much larger stream—passing through it we dipped and drank clear and pure water, almost to saturation, considering it the sweetest we had ever tasted. We now entered a level and mountainous country, streams and swamps were frequent, and the road lying through them we were obliged to wade, sometimes we stood in water and mud nearly up to the waist; I do no believe that there is an other road on the Western Coast of Africa, the travelling of which offers more difficulties than this one. The walking was really horrible, we had to force our way through gloomy thickets, & frequently the sharp-pointed limbs of trees catching our garments tore considerable holes in them—vines running across the path, entangled our feet and were exceedingly disagreeable. I cannot number the many stumbles and falls I had—Water being now plentiful, hunger began to invade us—and became the general complaint; some of the men greatly censured the guides for taking so circuitous a route, but they assured us that we were not far from a native town, where, they said, we could procure refreshments. This information revived our drooping courage—when gathering up our strength we pressed onward with accelerated speed. But the more we travelled the greater the distance seemed, and the more formidable our difficulties appeared. We still found streams and swamps—and the town seemed constantly more remote than ever. At length, after considerable fatigue, we hear a cry in front of the line—"Barricade a head!" The intelligence passed like electricity through the line, and seemed to inspire the spirit of every man, and each quickened with eagerness his pace we soon arrived at the town. Finding the gates of the barricade open we entered, saw many fine looking native huts; but to our bitter regret, and disappointment we found not a single individual in the town—it was desolate, having been deserted by the inhabitants, on account of the carnage which Boombo was carrying through the country, some of the men resolved to stop here and cook—but there were no conveniences. We therefore started out once more, being assured by the guides that the town to which they had reference, was just a little beyond. After a few hours travel we reached it, found it a pretty large one, inhabited by people of the Dey tribe. After our arrival at the gate of the barricade, we had to knock a considerable while before we could gain admission the inhabitants, not knowing who we were supposed that Boombo and his allies were attempting an invasion. When we entered the town and informed them of the errand on which we had been, and the success we had met, they appeared considerably rejoiced—and vied with each other in hospitality to us. They told us that Boombo's men had tried twice to take their town, but were, on both occasions routed. We had wondered at the barricade which surrounds Boombo' town—but this has increased it greatly in strength and magnificence of construction. It being now late in the afternoon, we conclude, that is, myself and few others, to stay at the town all night and proceed on our journey early the next day. The great body of the men having refreshed themselves now came to continue the journey, they therefore left us at the town. We soon retired to rest, and early the next morning, and feeling much refreshed and invigorated, having procured a native guide, we proceeded on our journey. As we advanced scenes of melancholy desolation appeared in sight. We saw several towns which after they had been entered by Boombo—and their inhabitants massacred, had been reduced to a heap of ruins. The last town we came to presented a most distressing scene, we found the bodies of several persons who had been cruelly put to death, in a putrescent state, lying in various parts of the town. It was not without the most painful sensation, that I gazed about me upon so horrifying a spectacle. We soon left the town impressed most deeply with a conviction of the cruelty and bloody deeds of Boombo. Soon after leaving the town, we found a dead body lying across the path—which was said to be a body of an old woman—who was taken prisoner by Boombo's people, but being unable to walk swiftly was killed and left in the path. We quickened our pace—and soon, the sound of the sea announced our proximity to the beach. We hurried on therefore—and reached there about 9 o'clock A. M. I had supposed that when I arrived at the beach I would be nearly home, but to my utter astonishment and mortification, I found myself, owing to the circuitous route which we had taken, but a little more than ten miles from the place whence we first set out—though the morning was pretty clear and serene; Cape Monserrado could not be seen. I trembled at the prospect of so tedious a journey as still lay before me. But being conscious of no alternative, I mustered up my strength and proceed d to walk—in the "hot sands." Finding that shoes were rather cumbrous I thought it wise to pull them off—which having been done, and the lower part of my pants rolled up above the knees, flattered myself that I could keep up with the company. But I soon discovered my mistake for those more accustomed to walking than I was before, and left me several miles behind. But I was not discouraged for there were two or three other feeble walkers left besides myself. With them I kept pace until we reached the St. Paul's river where we found the troops which had left us early evening previous, ready to embark. They welcomed us with joy and we were not less happy to overtake them. Canoes were employed to convey us across the river to Bushrod Island"—which being done we took up the line of march, and passing through the settlement arrived in Monrovia about half past 8 o'clock P. M. and were once more at rest with our friends on "Monserrado's height"—feeling grateful to a kind Providence whose watchful care had led us safely through the dangers of the forest

Yours Respectfully,

And the Vice Presidency.

Mr. Herald:—In the last number of your paper, we notice an article signed Edward J. Roye, in which that gentleman informs the public that "the partiality of his fellow citizens in different parts of the Republic, in conventional capacities, has nominated him a candidate for the Vice Presidency."

Now Mr. Editor, this is all news to many of your readers; and we beg to inquire when and where these conventions were held, and this important nomination was made. Verily, these things have been done in a corner! But, as it is said, Editors dive into all holes and corners, and by some means or other, are informed respecting every thing that transpires in the community—whether private or public—we most respectfully reques that you will have the goodness to enlighten many of your fellow citizens, who are wholly ignorant of the "conventional" proceedings referred to. If such conventions have been held we would like to know it, that we might judge of the extent of this "partiality," as it becomes us to act intelligently in a matter which so deeply concerns our best interests.

On one point Mr. Roye is sufficently explicit; and certainly deserves much credit for his candor. He gives us clearly to understand that if we elect him, he can only serve us when his doing so will not interfere with his private "business." Hear him. 'Not any office within the Republic could pecuniarily compensate for the suspension of my business."!!—This is plain language—as much as to say, I will serve you whenever that service does not interfere with my private affairs. Well this is honest.

It will be remembered that Mr. Roye, a few years ago, was elected to the respectable position of a Representative, in the Legislature, for the County of Monsterrado:—it will also be remembered, that at a time when his services were particularly needed—the Legislature being in session—and the best interests of his constituents at stake, Mr. Roye resigned his seat. And why forsooth?—Because his attendance upon the Legislature, just at that juncture, interfered with his private concerns!!! Mr. Roye's resignation, at a time when it was impossible to supply his place by a new election, was just cause of complaint and animadversion.

But that the people may now vote understandingly for him; and that he may stand excused before his constituents, should he—in the event of his election—find it necessary, from press of private business to abandon his post—we have his warning.

Yea, Mr. Roye, a burnt child dreads the fire. We will profit by the past—and take your meaning, for the future.

Your faithful servants

"Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much, "James, 5: 16."

The Lord above us hears,
All earnest prayers we make;
And lives there to bestow on us
What e'er we ask in prayer.

In time of trouble pray;
In time of anger pray;
And never let thy tongue forget,
To praise thy Savior's name.

He blesses all the means,
Of which his people make
To spread his name, and holiness,
Throughout this sinful world.

But sinners, though this word,
Is preach'd time after time
To them; will not repent from sin,
But live without the Lord.

Oh! let me cast my care,
Upon the Lord of heaven;
That I may find in Christ a home;
And there forever live.

The fervent prayer of him,
Who's righteous, much avails;
And if we ask the Lord in faith,
Our prayer, h'll surely hear.

Mr. Editor.—There has been much said as to the scheme of emigration from Africa to the british West Indies, some of the operations of which have at length reached us. And considerable speculation on the subject has been indulged here. From some the whole matter has met a sweeping denunciation; others not quite so ardent, have not ventured to condemn it, but content themselves with casting upon it a suspicious eye. While I concede to each class a right to its opinions, I only ask the liberty to differ from both—not to condemn the scheme nor regard it with suspicion.

It would be sufficient vindication of the scheme that it is under the patronage of the Government of Great Britain—a Government unwearied in its zeal, and exhaustless in its expenditures for Africa's weal. It would be an anomaly and a contradiction without a paralel, if the Government of Britian were to tolerate for a moment, any enterprise approaching at the utmost distance to the mere prestige of slavery. In fact the thought is too preposterous to be exposed. Now this emigration scheme is under the patronage of the Government. Of course, it has, in all its bearings and relations and probable contingencies been the subject of Governmental deliberation—and yet it is approved and encouriged. Moreover, if there was any thing wanted to secure the scheme from abuse, so far as it may be carried on in this Republic, it has been done by our Government, by requiring a compliance with the law regulating Passports: which effectually secures the helpless from being involuntarily sent away by avaricious and unscrupulous chiefs.

Independently of this consideration, the scheme is open for the reflection and inspection of all. Nothing is concealed. An offer is made for persons to emigrate to the West Indies on certain conditions, clearly and unequivocally put down. The persons are free to accept or reject—to go or remain. There is no compulsion.

Now it is an interesting question whether these people, should they accept the proposals and emigrate, will be individualy benefited Situated as they are at present, they are of no benefit to themselves nor to others. They are in the deepest degradation, and barbarism Their whole time is occupied in sleeping, from which they awake only to steal and fight. In the West Indies, they would be surrounded by influences which would correct these habits and propensities, and force them upon a course of industry and good order. In three years these habits would become natural, they would then be prepared to return to their country an altered people, with new tastes and desires, which alone would sustain them in a course of industry. Thus by their example, they would be a benefit to their countrymen.

Liberia, hail! hail thou happy land;
Thou, who hast been so long in darkness lain;
Divested of the light, which now thou hast;
And bending to the god of wood and stone;
Hath now began to shine, a glorious light,
By men, who once were lost, but found again.

Here planted on these shores, where once did stand,
The "Devil's bush," of heathen's earthly god:
Where they did worship, time that's past and gone;
And bade defiance, to the word of God;
A bless'd Republic, has appearance made;
Where she will stand, for ages that will come.

Gay—smiling plenty, reigns here around us;
All that is wanting, men to dig the ground:
Which must in future, pay the planter well,
In coffee, sugar indigo, and bread;
For all the labor, which he there bestow'd
As well as us, who hold this Country dear.
Long have we for a country, like this mourn'd:
And many who, without the sight have died;
But we have liv'd to see, the joyful hour;
When in the eastern horizon, there arose
A home, for all th' oppressed sons of Ham:

Which we in joyful notes, do call our land.
May this Republic's name, be borne abroad;
And those who govern her, be men of skill;
And may the God of heaven, on her smile;
And make her what she in name profess:
And may her influence, cause the color'd men,*
To say, "there is my home; for home I'm bound."

For the Vice Presidency.

The partiality, of my fellow citizens in different parts of the Republic in conventional capacities, has nominated me a candidate for the Vice Presidency. Due respect to which as requested to accept, prompts me hereby to tender the officials and the commonwealth my acceptance & grateful acknowledgements. Yet I have not sought, but strenuously refused the prospect of such distinction. Not any office within the Republic could pecuniarily compensate for the suspension of my business. But the chief offices should not be inviting for enriching emoluments, or for that which is considered the impetus in ordinary avocations. But for the establishment of those virtues, in every case, too high to be bought, and too valuable to be sold for silver or gold. The ways are so many for spending money in support of those honors that few men would want to make efforts to remain longer in office than four years. Not any matter how well the Executive functions may have been wielded, sound Republican policy suggests that custom, which is common law, should limit the Presidential term of service not beyond four years in the same hands for the good of the people

Without envy on the part of any, the balance of power should always be held convertable at will, without many restraints in the hands of the sovereign people. Who ought not to be less well versed in the science of self-government than any one of its public servants is skilled in its theory and practice. Otherwise the scale might turn & the servant take the place of the master of the people. For history and experience teach that man is but man, a ndtherfore, at best estate fallible. 'Caution is the parent of safety.' Under Divine Providence, this Republic is destined to be perfected and enlarged into the great future home of the oppressed exile of our race, now interspersed over foreign lands. Whose benign influences, with ours, must reclaim the heathen of this great Peninsula from his moral night. For, verily, we owe the duty both to God and our degraded race, to make it the most acceptable and desirable, Religious and civil home in the World. We owe much of our importance to success in the attainment of these great and noble ends Let us do our duty as responsible agents in the work.

Very respectfully submitted to the conventions their officials and fellow citizens,

Mr. Editor:—As the election is fast approaching, and consequently exciting increasing interest, and as there are some who suppose, and endeavour to inculcate among the ignorant, that a re-election of the present incumbent to the Presidency would be establishing a monarchy, and therefore a total infraction of the Constitution, allow me to make a few inquiries and statements.

Is that instrument known as the Constitution of Liberia," the basis upon which the superstructure of the Republic is reared? If so is there any specified time therein, at the expiration of which the Chief Magistrate shall cease to be re-eligible?—if there is, and if that time has expired then a reelection were a gross infringement upon the Constitution, and consequently Anti-Republican. But if the Constitution makes no such provision, if it establishes no such period;—and if it is the prerogative of the people to elect and re-elect the Executive as often as they see proper, then a reelection could not be anti-republican, according to our Constitution, the basis of Liberian Republicanism.—And if the majority of the people, saw proper to re-elect the Incumbent Magistrate twenty times, the principles of the Constitution would in no wise be altered—nor departed from.

But the outcry seems to be—Let us have a change—"a change is necessary" &c—what for? "Why the President has been in long enough" "long enough!"—why the Constitution does not determine the length of time he shall serve. This power, as was intimated above, is vested in the people, i. e. the majority. It is their prerogative to decide this matter, and so long as they desire his services and testify the same at the polls, it is unconstitutional to say, he "has been in long enough."

Another ground on which many urge a change is, that "they want to see Internal improvements made "I have often thought when hearing this reason adduced, that, as "clarity begins at home, it would not be amiss, if these strenuous advocates of internal improvements would begin upon themselves, as some are in pressing need of it. Personal "improvements," in the mechanical arts and sciences, and in literature, are, in my humble opinion, the kind most needed in Liberia at present.

Yours &c.

Note.—F. R. Liberia puts questions to us and then answers them so well, that we are saved the trouble of even thinking about them. We would be acting inconsistent if we did not admit that the remarks of our correspondent are very sound and well timed. It cannot seriously be supposed, that any one believes, that the constitution of the Republic will be violated, by re-electing a man to office fifty times over, or as many times as he may be disposed to obey the will of the people. It is in the power of the people, if they think it will tend to the public good—to keep men in office as long as they may live, and not to permit a change in any of the departments of Government. All power is vested in the people—so says the Constitution, the basis upon which our political existence rests. It is not required that we make further reference to the communication of our correspondent—he has plainly spoken, and we doubt not that all our readers will properly understand him and govern themselves accordingly, so is it our will and pleasure.—HERALD.

Mr Editor:—

Occupying the position you do, your observation on Liberian affairs must necessarily be varied and extensive; and, indeed, for marking their progress and noticing every—thing which tends either to their detriment or welfare, your position is highly favorable

Please indulge me therefore with a few queries. There are certain persons who unhesitatingly aver, that, as a general thing, those who favor the re-election of the present incumbent, For the Presidency are among the most intelligent, reflecting, patriotic and influential persons in the Republic: that the majority of them are old residents and consequently more prepared to judge of the wants, of Liberia and to determine what the indispensable qualifications of men intrusted with the control of its public affairs should be. I have, pondered these things, and though no politician, yet, desiring the welfare and prosperity of our infant Republic, I would be glad to ascertain whether these are facts,—If they are. Do they argue anything? If so, what?

Your obt Servant
NEW COMER.

Monrovia, April, 4th, 1853

Reply. We do not admit that our position gives us better opportunities for judging public affairs, than others, still we think and speak on matters like others of our fellow citizens. So Mr "New Comer," we tell your before hand that we know about as much, perhaps much less than many others.

It is not doubted, we think, that President Roberts will be strongly supported, for another re-election, by some of the first citizens in the Republic Indeed we are well aware, that until a committee, consisting of some of the most intelligent and influential persons in Liberia waited on President Roberts, and influenced him to be a candidate for re-election, that he had determind on retiring to private life after the expiration of the present term, nor did he then fully consent to a nomination. But a few days afterward the Senate of Liberia, addressed him a note, urging upon him the fact that the country still needed his services and hoped that he would not decline a nomination. It was under these circumstances that President Roberts consented to allow himself to be nominated—he did not think himself at liberty to retire to private life when it was intimated to him, that the State still required his services. Our correspondent, will know, or will likely, beleive, that as President Roberts was brought forward by many good,—and "old citizens" too if you please, and that the representatives of the people urged him also to consent—that it is more than probable that public matters still need his guidance for another term. And we are confirmed in this opinion, from the fact, that those whom the people elected to attend to the affairs of Government in a legislative capacity, and who should know the state of public matters, and what is desired to bring them into a healthy condition,—have unhesitatingly, and without being asked an opinion on the subject, given it as their decided belief, that the public weal demands the services of the present incumbent, another term.— HERALD

Brig Zebra,

The American brig Zebra, Captain William Hart, came to anchor in our harbor, on the 28th. ultimo, after a passage of 45 days from Savannah, Georgia, having on board 93 immigrants for this Republic. For further particulars respecting the Zebra and the disease which raged so fatally on board of her, a few days after she sailed from New Orleans, we refer our readers to the following communication from Mr. Wm. H. J. one of the immigrants by the Zebra.—LIBERIA HERALD

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor:—Sir, in regard to the voyage of the brig Zebra, and her company of immigrants I will offer you a few remarks. The brig Zebra sailed from New Orleans, on the 31st. day of January, last, with a healthy company of immigrants, about 137 in number;—we sailed for two days in good health;—on the third day, sickness made its appearance; and the more aged immigrants on board, were taken first;—namely, Mr. Jannary Brisk, Mr Carter Smith, and so on;—and from three to four died in a day, for the space of fourteen days. At the expiration of that period, we arrived at Savannah, Georgia, where we immediately changed the water and casks, which was the sole cause of the sickness which raged so fatally among us; and from the time we began to use good water, that was put on board of our ship, at Savannah, by order of the Society's Agent, at that place, our ship's company commenced improving, and continued to improve till we arrived here

We lost 39 out of our company of immigrants;—the Captain, Mate, Steward, Cabin-boy, and one sailor died also, making the number of deaths 44

After our arrival at Savannah, we remained there four weeks, after which, we put to sea again, and came the whole distance of 4,000 miles, without lossing one person, though we, of course, attribute the cause of the mortality, to the drinking of bad water;—and here it may not be amiss, to state, that the casks, in which the water was put, for the use of the immigrants, had been formerly used, as linseed oil, casks, and that in each of them there must have been about a gallon of oil

MONROVIA, APRIL 6th, 1853.

We have seldom witnessed the trial of a case, producing so much interest as that of Boombo's. The readers of the "Herald," need not be told, that Boombo is a chieftian of Little Cape Mount, that he had voluntarily entered into an arrangement with the Government of Liberia, and subscribed to demean himself according to the laws and constitution— also, that him and his people lived on lands purchased by the Government of Liberia, from the native owners. Boombo though bound by his solemn engagements to refrain from wars, and not to disturb the peace and quietness of the country, has repeatedly since he placed himself under the laws of Liberia, broken his engagements by carrying on predatory wars destroying towns and murdering and carrying into captivity hundreds of inoffensive men, women, and children. To all the remonstrances of Government, Boombo gave no heed, and his bloody career did not end until he was brought to this City a prisoner. George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, is also amenable to the laws of Liberia; and it is now well ascertained that he was the principal actor in all the disturbances created in the Little Cape Mount Country. Boombo, it appears, acted under his direction.

At the last Court of "Quarter Sessions," Boombo was indicted for "High Misdemeanor"—the indictment set forth a general allegation and three special counts. The first count charged the prisoner with violating his obligations and allegiance to the Government, and that he did procure and make war upon and against one Dwarloo Bey and certain other Gourah chiefs, occupying a portion of the territories of Grand and Little Cape Mount—that he murdered the inhabitants—carried into captivity large numbers of the defenceless,—sacked, burned and pillaged towns and villages and laid waste the country. The second count charged, that Boombo violated &c, &c, as before—that he did procure and make war upon and against one Weaver, a Dey chieftian—crossing the Little Cape Mount river, and entering the Dey country for that purpose—that he murdered inhabitants, carried others into captivity and sacked, burned, and pillaged towns and villages and laid waste the country. The third count, charged that Boombo did violate &c, &c, as before, and that he committed felony, by seizing and carrying off merchandize from factories belonging to citizens of Monrovia. The Attorney General, Hon. Draper Esqr. was assisted in this case by David A. Madison Esqr. of Buchanan, Grand Bassa. D. T. Harriss and J. B. Phillips Esqrs: appeared for the prisoner—and we are pleased to say that these gentlemen did all that honest and patriotic men could do for a man under such circumstances. They ably and eloquently defended the prisoner upon every point that formality and technicality would admit of, but as they could not argue the lock off the door and as the evidence, especially that given by prisoner's witnesses, was point blank against Boomoo, the verdict was guilty of each count.

The leading counsel for the prisoner, D. T. Harriss Esqr; duly entered into a constitutional argument in relation to the quantum of punishment that should be inflicted upon the prisoner, appealing impressively to the Jury and Court in behalf of the prisoner

The sentence was—restitution, restoration, and reparation of goods stolen, people captured, and damages committed:—to pay a fine of $5,000, and be imprisoned for two years. When the sentence was pronounced the convict shed tears, regarding the ingredient of imprisoment, in his sentence, to be almost intolerable. It is hoped that this will prove a salutary example to all other Chieftians under the jurisdiction of this Government: that they may henceforward, be convinced of the determination and power of the Government to administer justice in the premises. It is the belief of many, that Boombo's punishment as per sentence, is too great—but we believe to the contrary. Until rigorous measures are used to deter Chieftians from carrying on their predatory wars, there cannot be any guarrantee, but that some part of our coast, will allways be in a state of savage warfare.

Loss by Fire. A few days since, the soap factory of Hon. Deserline T. Harriss, accidently took fire, and was almost entirely consumed. The contents, consisted of implements and materials for soap making, were all consumed. This is a severe loss to Mr. Harriss, and we feel deeply for him. But he must not forget that we are all subject to losses, and when they do occur, we should not give up and fret; but press forward, in the hope of soon regaining what we have loss.

Launch. On the mornnig of the 2nd, inst: we had the gratification of witnessing the launch of as fine a specimen of ship building, we remember ever to have seen. It was from the wharf of Hon. D. B. Warner, and is of a about ten tons burthen Mr. Warner built her, and she is spoken of by a number of persons who have examined her, as a beautiful craft. Her name is "Try, Try, Again."

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, Messrs Hyde, Hodge &co. of London, contractors with Her Britannic Majesty's Government, to furnish Laborers from the African Coast, for the West Indies, have sent some of their ships to the coast of the Republic, offering an advance of Ten Dollars for every person who may be induced to emigrate:—And, whereas, the extinction of the slave trade has left large numbers of predial and other laborers in the possession of the Chiefs, and principal men of the country.—While the offer of Ten Dollars each, is nearly equivalent to the amount formerly paid for slaves, during the prevalence of the Slave Trade, and which operated mainly in producing and sustaining the wars, by which the country was distracted—And, whereas, certain refractory Chiefs are reported to have engaged with the Agents of said Company, to furnish a number of Laborers, and are further known to have in concealment near Grand Cape Mount, a number of the unhappy victims of their predatory excursions.—And; Whereas, complaint has been made to the Government that persons are held to be sent off without their voluntary consent, or the consent of their natural guardians:—Therefore, to prevent the abuses and evils which might otherwise result from the enterprise:

Be it known by this Proclamation, to all whom it may concern, that the law regulating Passports must be strictly observed—that vessels carrying, or intending to carry away emigrants, must come to this port with their emigrants on board, to obtain passports—in order that an opportunity may be presented to the Government to ascertain whether the emigration be free or constrained. Every violation of the law regulating passports, will be visited with the utmost penalty of the law, in that case made and provided.

POETRY

THE SPELLS OF HOME.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

By the soft green light in the woody glade,
On the banks of moss where thy childhood played,
By the household tree through which thine eye
First looked in love to the summer sky;
By the dewy gleam, by the very breath
Of the primrose tufts in the grass beneath,
Upon thy heart there is laid a spell
Holy and precious—oh! guard it well!

By the sleepy ripple of the stream,
Which has lulled thee into many a dream;
By the shiver of the ivy leaves
To the wind of morn, at thy casement eaves;
By the bees's deep murmur in the limes;
By the music on the Sabbath chimes;
By every sound of thy native shade,
Stronger and dearer the spell is made.

By the gathering around the winter hearth,
When twilight called unto household mirth,
By the fairy tale, or the legend old,
In that ring of happy faces told;
By the quiet hour when hearts unite
In the parting prayer and the kind good night;
By the smiling eye and the loving tone
Over thy life has the spell been thrown.

And bless that gift! it hath gentle might,
A guardian power and a guiding light;
It hath led the freeman forth to stand
In the mountain battle of his land;
It hath brought the wanderer o'er the seas,
To [illegible] on the hills of his own fresh breeze;
[illegible] to the gates of his father's hail,
[illegible] of the weeping prodigal.

[illegible] the heart in its pride would stray
[illegible] first loves of its youth away,
[illegible] ying breath of the world would come
[illegible] flowers it brought from its childhood's home.

[illegible] gain of the woody glade,
[illegible] by the rustling ivy made;
[illegible] of the tree at thy father's door,
And the kindly spell shall have the power once more.

WHO I WITHOUT INFLUENCE?

It is melancholy to think how many persons are wasting their lives under an impression that they are destitute of the abilities and means to be useful in any important measure. And yet history is full of examples showing that where there is a strong desire to do good, the means and the power to do it will never be wanting. It were easy to fill columns of our sheet with cheering examples, but let one suffice. We refer to Sarah Martin, an English woman of humble origin, and dependent upon her own exertions for a living. She was born at Caister, a village three miles from Yarmouth, in 1791. Her parents were poor and died when she was a little child, leaving Sarah to be brought up by her grandmother. She received but little education and learned the trade of dressmaking at Yarmouth, from which she afterwards for years earned a shilling a day by going out to sew in families as an assistant.

It happened in 1819, that a woman was sent to Yarmouth jail for cruelly beating and ill using her own child. Sarah Martin was at this time 28 years old, and the report of the above crime made a deep impression on her mind. She had often before felt a deep interest in the inmates of the prison as she passed its gloomy walls, and longed to visit them. The idea took fast hold of the mind of this gentle, unlovely negifted, poor young woman, and she could not resist the impulse to visit the prisoners.

So one day she passed into the dark porch with a throbbing heart and knocked for admission. In her gentle, low voice, she mentioned to the jailer the cruel mother's name, but was refused. She went away sorrowful, but she resolved to try again. The next time she was admitted.

She entered and stood before the culprit mother. Speaking of it afterwards, Sarah Martin says: "She was surprised at the sight of a stranger. When I told her the object of my visit she burst into tears and thanked me." Those tears and thanks shaped the whole course of Sarah Martin's future life! And such a life! We are not ashamed to confess that tears have been to our own eyes as we passed in review the loving ministry of this humble woman.

From this time she entered with system and vigor upon the work of mercy to the prisoner. A genial spirit, recording her labors, says: She labored alone, without any aid from influential quarters: she had no persuasive eloquence, and had scarcely received any education, she was a poor seamstress, maintaining herself by her needle, and she carried on her visitation of the prisoners in secret, without any one vaunting her praises; indeed, this was the last thing she dreamt of. Is there not, in this simple picture of a humble woman thus devoting her leisure hours to the comfort and improvement of outcasts, much that is truely noble and heroic?

Sarah Martin continued her visits to the Yarmouth gaol. From one she went to another prisoner, reading to them and conversing with them, from which she went on to instructing them in reading and writing. She constituted herself a school-mistress for the criminals, giving up a day in the week for this purpose, and thus trenching on her slender means of living. "I thought it right," she says, "to give up a day in the week from dressmaking to serve the prisoners. This regularly given, with many an additional one was not felt as a pecuniary loss but was ever followed with abundant satisfaction, for the blessing of God was upon me."

She next formed a Sunday service in the gaol, for reading of the Scriptures, joining in the worship as a hearer. For three years she went on in this quiet course of visitation, until, as her views enlarged, she introduced other ameliorative plans for the benefit of the prisoners. One week in 1823, she received from two gentlemen donations of ten shillings each for prison charity. With this she bought material for baby clothes, cut them out, and set the females to work. The work, when sold, enabled her to buy other materials, and thus the industrial education of the prisoners was secured. Sarah Martin teaching those to sew and knit who had not before learnt to do so. The profits derived from the sale of the articles were placed together in a fund, and divided amongst the prisoners on their leaving the gaol to commence life again in the outer world. She, in the same way, taught the men to make straw hats, men's and boy's caps grey cotton shirts, and even patchwork—anything to keep them out of idleness and from preying upon their own thoughts. Some also she taught to copy little pictures, with the same object, in which several of the prisoners took great delight. A little later on she formed a fund out of the prisoners earnings which she applied to the furnishing of work to prisoners on their discharge: "Affording me," she says, "the advantage of observing their conduct as the same."

Thus did the humble Sarah Martin, long before the attention of public men had been directed to the subject of prison discipline, bring a complete system to maturity in the gaol of Yarmouth. It will be observed that she had included visitation, moral and religious instruction, intellectual culture, industrial training employment during prison hours; and employment after discharge. While learned men at a distance were philosophically discussing these knotty points, here was a poor seamstress at Yarmouth, who, in a quiet, simple and unostentatious manner had practically settled them all!

Our space will not permit the grateful task of continuing this record, which, to the end, is full of the same devotion and patient love. Let us add that she labored not in vain. The effect was most happy upon the prisoners; and her own soul grew into angelic loveliness and joy, and when death, in 1843, closed her services, clasping her hands, as the last death-struggle ceased, she exclaimed, "Thank God! Thank God!" and passed to her reward, leaving her pure example to rebuke the indolence and selfishness of the many, and to encourage the few who would go and do likewise.—N. Y Recorder.

The Pantograph—Surprising Invention.—Among the wonderful discoveries or inventions ending in "graph," the Pantograph seems destined to take no second part. It is a cutting and carving machine, which works with celerity, great precision and finish, and is applicable to innumerable purposes of ornament and use. This remarkable invention has been patented by Mr. Searby. Acting on the principle of the slide-rest, or floating bed, and directed by the Pantograph, the machine is moved with such facility and exactness in all the directions of the cube, under a fixed tool or tools, that is capable of producing, in cutting, carving, or engraving, a fac-simile of almost anything presented to its operation. The enumeration of all the purposes to which this strange piece of mechanism is applicable, would exhaust imagination. The hardest substances offer no impediment to its powers. In stone or marble, in ivory or wood, in pearl or metal, it can turn out copies of any shape you please; and, by a principle of easy adjustment on a scale as much larger or smaller than the original as may be desired. It will engrave seals to any pattern—turn out an exact copy of the Medicean Venus, or the Greek Slave; furnish blocks to the calico printer, the floor cloth manufacturer, the paper stainer, and the letter press printer; execute monumental tablets & architectural ornaments; form saw handles; cut names and sign boards; or do any thing else which requires any sort of shape or impression to be given to the hardest materials, performing that which appears the most difficult or delicate feat with as much despatch, exactness and finish as the easiest and least pretending.

The utility of the machine may be inferred from its applicability in the single department of saw handles. The saw handle manufacture of Sheffield alone employs four hundred hands, who make, on an average, fifteen handles each a day, or 36,000 a week, which, at one penny per handle, would return £7800 per annum. Now, one of the company's machines, managed by a man and boy, will produce 300 handles a day from one cutter; but, it is obvious that the the entire trade might be supplied by a few machines. It remains only to mention, that the machine is cheap, and may be wrought with ease by any description of power from hand to steam.—Baltimore Weekly American.

THE HISTORY OF SERMONS

When shall the world be favored with a history of the pulpit, and who will write it? Such a work is a great desideratum, and, well executed might prove of incalculable value. The world is full of material, which only needs to be collected, sifted and arranged. Let some one of our men of might gird himself for the task.

One chapter in such a work, or perhaps more, should be given to the origin and history of sermons, and curious indeed would be its developments; especially if all their secret history could be made known. Let us give two or three facts, which may go to show somewhat of what we mean.

One of the most beautiful and popular of the sermons of Robert Hall is the one occasioned by the death of the amiable Princess Charlotte, who died in 1817;—a sermon which he had not even thought of delivering, an hour before its commencement. Devoted to his study, this eminent man seldom looked at a newspaper, and was supremely ignorant of passing events, so that he was not aware of the time when the princess was to be buried. This event occurred on a Wednesday evening, just at the time of Mr Hall's weekly lecture. Royal bereavements in England generally have attention paid them from the pulpit, especially at the hour of interment, but the thought never occured to Mr Hall, that anything more than ordinary service would take place at Harvey Lane. On his arrival there as usual, behold the whole house was lighted up and crowded. "How is this, sir?" asked Hall of one of his deacons. "What does this crowd mean?" "Why, sir the Princess Charlotte, you know, is buried this evening, and the people are come to hear your funeral sermon for her." "Well, sir, I am very sorry, but I had entirely forgotten it; ask Mr —— to introduce the service, and I will sit down in the vestry, and endeavor to think of something to say." The substance of the sermon on the topic, which appears in the first volume of his Works, was the result of half an hour's reflections; the sermon was afterwards written, published, and produced great effects. The widowed prince described it as the best of all the sermons sent him on the occasion, and another eminent man thought that the production of such a sermon went far to account for the mysterious removal of the princess.

Much smaller events than the removal of the great have suggested good sermons. The admirable discourse on Walking by Faith, the first sermon printed by Andrew Fuller, owed its origin to a small matter. It was delivered at an annual meeting of the Northamptonshire Association, at whose request it was printed. Like the sermon of his friend Hall, not a word of it was written till after its delivery. On his way to the Association, the roads in several places were flooded, arising from recent rains which had made the rivers overflow. Mr. Fuller came to one place where the water was very deep, and he, being a stranger to its exact depth, was unwilling to go on. A plain countryman residing in the neighborhood, better acquainted with the water than the preacher, cried out, "Go on, sir, you are quite safe." Fuller urged on his horse, but the water soon touched his saddle, and he stopped to think. "Go on, sir, all is right," shouted the man. Taking the man at his word, Fuller proceeded, and the text was suggested, "We walk by faith, not by sight."

Benjamin Beddome, the author of some of our best hymns, was a remarkable nervous man, and could seldom preach a sermon on any public occasion with pleasure. Being engaged at an Association, at the very last moment he quarrelled with his sermon, and inquired of a brother, "Ask no foolish questions." Beddome instantly read the text, "Avoid foolish questions," and delivered an admirable sermon, which was secured in short hand at the moment, and was printed by Dr. Rippon some fifty years ago, in his Baptist Annual Register.

The admirable sermon of Dr. Ebenezer Porter, of Andover, "Great Effects from Little Causes," thousands of which have been circulated in this country, and which has been translated into the French language, and extensively circulated in France, "originated," says his biographer, "as follows. Dr Porter had, on a certain occasion, made an engagement of some importance, which he was expected to fulfil at a specified time, soon after dinner. A slight incident at the table delayed the meal a few moments, and thus deranged his plans, and disappointed the expectations of those he was to meet. As he rode towards the place of his appointment, the words were suggested to him, 'How great a matter a little fire kindleth!' and at once the train of thought embraced in this sermon flashed upon his mind. This was Friday. He could find no time to write, however, till the afternoon of the day following. He then addressed himself to the execution of his plan, and by bed time the discourse was completed. He valued it but little at the time.—Watchman & Reflecter.

ON SLEEP.

No person of active mind should try to prevent sleep, which, in such persons, only comes when rest is indispensable to the continuance of health. In fact, sleep once in the twenty-four hours is as essential to the existence of the mammalia as the momentary respiration of fresh air. The most unfavourable conditions for sleep cannot prevent its approach. Coachmen slumber on their coaches, and couriers on their horses, whilst soldiers fall asleep on the field of battle, amidst all the noise of artillery and the tumult of war. During the retreat of Sir John Moore, several of the British soldiers were reported to have fallen asleep upon the march, and yet they continued walking onward. The most violent passions and excitement of mind cannot preserve even powerful minds from sleep; thus Alexander the Great slept on the field of Arbela, and Napoleon upon that of Austerlitz. Even stripes and torture cannot keep off sleep, as criminals have been known to slumber on the rack. Doses which serve at first to drive away sleep, soon become indispensable to its existence; thus a stage-coach stopping to change horses, wakes all the passengers. The proprietor of an iron forge, who slept close to the din of hammers, forges, and blast furnaces, would awake if there was any interruption to them during the night; and a sick miller, who had his mill stopped on that account, passed sleepless nights until the mill resumed its usual noise.

The length of time passed in sleep, is not the same for all men; it varies in different individuals and at different ages; but it cannot be determined, from time passed in sleep, relative to the strength or energy of the functions of the body or mind. From six to nine hours is the average proportion, yet the Roman Emperor, Caligula, slept only three hours, Frederick of Prussia and Dr John Hunter, consumed only four or five hours in repose, while the great Scipio slept during nine. A rich and lazy citizen will slumber from ten to twelve hours daily. It is during infancy that sleep is longest and most profound. Women also sleep longer than men, and young men longer than old. Sleep is driven away during convalescence, after a long sickness, by a continued fasting and the abuse of coffee. The sleepless nights of old age are almost proverbial. It would appear, carnivorous animals sleep in general longer than the herbivorous, as the superior activity of the muscles and senses of the former seem more especially to require repair.—The Friend.

Anecdote of Latimer.

It is related of Latimer, that when he once preached before that tyrant Henry VIII, he took a plain straightforward text, and in his sermon assailed those very sins for which the monarch was notorious; and he was stung to the quick, for truth always finds a response in the worst man's conscience. He would not bend beneath the authority of his God, but sent for Latimer, and said; Your life is in jeopardy, if you do not recant all you said to day, when you preach next sunday." The trimming courtiers were all anxious to know the consequences of this and the chapel was crowded. The venerable man took his text, and after a pause, began with a soliloquy thus:

"Now, Hugh Latimer, bethink thee, thou art in the presence of thy earthly monarch—thy life is in his hands, and if thou dost not suit his fancies, he will bring down thy gray hairs to the grave: but, Hugh Latimer, bethink thee thou art in the presence of the King of kings and Lord of lords who hath told thee "Fear not them that kill the body, and can do more; but rather fear him who can kill both body and soul, and cast thee into hell forever!" Yea, I say Hugh Latimer fear him."

He then went on, and not only enforced what he had before advanced, but if possible enforced it with greater emphasis. After he had finished, Henry sent for him and said:

"How durst thou insult thy monarch so?" Latimer replied "I thought if I were unfaithful to my God, I could not be loyal to my king." The king embraced the good old bishop, exclaiming, "There is yet one man left who is bold enough to tell me the truth."

LAW OF LOVE.

This universal law of love, is intimately connected with man in all his relations, under all circumstances, and embracing the whole human family, white and black, bond and free, and wherever suffering, oppression and misery exist, this law or principle, is or should be, called into active operation.

Under the Jewish law, the stranger must be respected, loved and protected, his rights conceded, his feelings regarded, his comforts and happiness secured to him. Under that law, those in distress must be relieved, their sorrows assuaged by kind sympathies, their grief alleviated by acts of kindness, and the exhibition of love manifested in things conducive to their joy and their fellicity.

And certainly the Christian system aims at the same object, and is designed to promote the same universal feeling of sympathy for all mankind, yea, it confirms, strengthens, and fortifies the law of benevolence and universal feeling of good will to the human race, and requires that we love not our intimate friends only, but our very enemies; and enjoins that we do good to those who have sought to injure us, and thus break down the feeling of hatred, animosity and evil which may exist in the heart of our neighbor.

Christianity seeks to establish one common brotherhood to bring all upon the same level of equality, to raise up the low, the degraded, the oppressed,—to elevate the whole human family to a height of excellence and moral beauty, to a point of enjoyment and happiness where all may present the nobleness of the most exalted character; exhibiting the sublimity of the moral perfections— he excellency of the enjoyment and power of intellectual endowments, and the full stature of men as made in the image of God." Nothing short of this will fully satisfy its claims, the demands, and the ends of the Christian system.

This system has for its basis two strong, mighty pillars,—love to God and love to man. The whole superstructure is built upon two universal commandments; Supremely reverence and adore the Being who made us, and feel really render to every son and daughter of Adam all requisite good; or in the language of Scripture—"Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, might, mind and strength and thy neighbor as thyself." —Rev. William J. Robinson's Sermon.

HISTORY OF PALESTINE AFTER THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM.

BY DR. KITTO.

A. D. 1203 to 1850

1. In the meantime, though partial successes were gained by the armies of the Crusaders in Palestine, their power was on the decline. A truce for six years had been concluded with Saphadin, the brother and successor of the Sultan Saladin. The sovereign of the Latin kingdom at this time was Mary, the daughter of Isabella by Conrade of Tyre. Almeric and his wife being dead. In order to strengthen the government of Jerusalem, it was resolved to request the king of France, Philip Augustus, to provide a husband for Mary. John de Brienne, one of the most accomplished cavaliers in Europe, of tried valour and experience in war, was chosen; and the Christian chiefs were so elated by this union, that they sought a pretence for breaking the subsisting truce between them and the Sultan, and bringing matters to the arbitration of the sword. War accordingly ensued, and the new monarch of Jerusalem displayed all the great qualities of a statesman and a soldier, for which he was chosen; and though his success did not entirely correspond to his hopes or wishes, yet he made a successful defence, and maintained for a time the Latin kingdom against the growing power of its enemies. He foresaw, however, that its gradual decline and final ruin were approaching, as it was now reduced to two or three towns, and preserved only in a precarious existence by the divisions and civil wars that prevailed among its enemies.

2. This intelligence re kindled the dying zeal of the Christian world. A new Crusade was commenced, and a large force, chiefly of Hungarians and Germans, landed at Acre. The sons of Saphadin, who now ruled in Syria, collected their armies to oppose this formidable attack. But the Crusaders, rashly conducted, and weakened by divisions, advanced into the country without concert or prudence; provisions failed them; they were wasted, as usual, by famine and disease; and at length their leader, the sovereign of Hungary, resolved to quit a country where he had been exposed to hardship and danger, without glory. The crusading armies, thus weakened and discouraged, had laid aside all further idea of offensive operations, when, in the spring of the following year, a fleet of 300 vessels, from the Rhine, appeared on the coast, and brought to their aid powerful reinforcements, which recruited their strength, and restored their ascendancy in the field. For reasons which do not clearly appear, they now retired from Palestine, and carried the war into Egypt, where they obtained important successes, having taken Damietta by storm, and spread such consternation among the infidels, that the most favorable terms of peace were offered, and rejected by the Crusaders. Soon after, however, having wasted their strength on the banks of the Nile, they were reduced to the necessity of bargaining for permission to retire to Palestine, by the cession of all their conquests in Egypt.

3. The next Crusade was undertaken by Frederick II., the grand son of Barbarossa, according to a vow which had been long made, and the performance of which had been so long delayed, that he was excommunicated by Gregory IX. By his marriage with Violante, the daughter of John de Brienne, he was the more especially bound to vindicate his right to the kingdom of Jerusalem, which he had received as a dowry with his wife. After many delays, he set sail with a fleet of 200 ships and an army of 40,000 men, and arrived at Acre. This was the most successful and the most bloodless expedition that had yet been undertaken. Without the hazard of a battle Frederic entered Jerusalem in triumph. The Saracen power was at this time weakened by divisions; and owing to suspected treachery among his kindred, Kamel, the son of Saphadin, held precarious possession of the throne. It was his policy, therefore, rather to disarm the hostility of these powerful armies by treating with them, than to encounter them in the field; and accordingly a treaty was concluded, by which Jerusalem, Jaffa, Bethlehem, Nazareth, and their dependencies, were restored to the Christians; religious toleration was established, and the contending parties of Christians and Mohammedans were allowed each to offer up their devotions, the first in the mosque El Aksa, and the last in the mosque of Omar.* But all these services were performed by Frederic while under the stain of excommunication; and hence the patriarch, when he made his entry into Jerusalem, refused to crown him, or to be present at the ceremonial; Frederic, therefore, himself took the crown from the holy sepulchre, and placed it on his own head. The stipulations of this treaty were not faithfully observed by the Saracens, and the Christians in Palestine still suffered under the oppression of the infidels. New levies were raised in Europe for the holy war, and a large force of French and English, led by the chief nobility of both nations, landed in Syria. Numerous battles were fought, which terminated in favour of the Saracens; and the French Crusaders, accordingly after severe losses were glad to purchase peace by the cession of almost all their conquests in Palestine. Next year, when the Earl of Cornwall, with the English levy, arrived at the scene of action, he found, to his surprise, that all the territories and privileges which had been ceded to the emperor of Germany were lost; and that a few fortresses, and a small strip of territory on the coast, comprised all that the Latins possessed in Palestine. He immediately prepared for the vigorous prosecution of hostilities. But the Sultan, being involved in war with his brother in Damascus, readily granted favourable terms as the price of peace—namely, the cession to the Christian armies of Jerusalem, Beirut, Nazareth, Bethlehem, Mount Tabor, and a large tract of the adjoining country. But the kingdom of Jerusalem, thus so happily re-established, was subverted by a calamity from a new and unexpected quarter. In the interior of Asia the conquests of Ghengnis Khan had brought about the most stupendous revolutions, and the barbarous hordes of the desert, flying before his conquering sword, rushed like a torrent on other nations. The Kharismians, unable to withstand this powerful invader, were driven upon Syria, and the coalesced powers of Saracen and Christian were unable to resist their powerful assault. The Christian host was overthrown in a great battle, which lasted two days, and in which the grand masters of two orders, and most of the knights, were slain. The merciless invaders revelled in the sack and pillage of the Holy city, sparing neither sex nor age; and it was not until the year 1247 that they were routed near Damascus, by the Syrians and Mamluks, and driven back to their former settlements on the Caspian Sea.

4. Each new disaster of the Christian arms served to re-kindle the languishing zeal of the Europeans; and Louis IX. of France fitted out an immense armament for the Holy Land, consisting of 1800 sails, in which he embarked an army of 50,000 men. He landed in Egypt and, after storming the town of Damietta, advanced along the sea-coast towards Cairo, when his troops were so wasted by sickness and famine, that they fell an easy prey to the enemy. The king, the most of his nobles, and the remnant of his army, were made prisoners; and it were owing to the clemency of the Sultan Moadhdham, who accepted a ransom for their lives that Louis, with his few surviving followers, was permitted to embark for Palestine.

5. The power of the Christians in Palestine, weakened, among other causes, by internal dissensions, was now vigorously assailed by the Sultan Bibars, the Mamluk sovereign of Egypt. He invaded Palestine with a formidable army, advanced to the gates of Acre, and, reducing the town of Sepphoris and Azotus, massacred or carried into captivity numbers of Christians. The important city of Antioch yielded to his powerful assault, when 40,000 of the inhabitants were put to the sword, and 100,000 carried into captivity. The report of these cruelties in Europe gave rise to the ninth and last Crusade against the infidels, which was undertaken by Louis the French king, sixteen years after his return from captivity. In place of directing his arms immediately against Palestine, he landed in Africa, and laid siege to Carthage, which he reduced. But he perished miserably on the burning sands of Africa, of a pestilential disease, which proved fatal also to many of his troops; and thus ingloriously terminated this expedition, which was the last undertaken by the Europeans for the recovery of the Holy Land.

6. The Europeans in Palestine were now confined within the walls of Acre, their last stronghold, which was besieged by a Mamluk host of 200,000 troops, that issued from Egypt, and encamped on the adjacent plain. In this their last conflict with the infidels of the Holy Land, the Europeans fully maintained the glory of their high name. They displayed all the devotion of martyrs in a holy cause, and performed prodigies of valour. But, equalled as they were in discipline, and fearfully overmatched in numbers, by their enemies, they were overborne by the weight and violence of their attacks, and in the storm and sack of the city, all either perished or were carried into captivity. Thus terminated for ever all those visions of glory and conquest by which so many adventurers were seduced from Europe to the Holy Land, there to perish under the complicated perils of disease and the sword. The other seaport towns which still remained in possession of the Christians yielded without a struggle to the Moslem arms, and, under the religious tyranny of the infidels which succeeded, the Christians in Palestine were every where reduced to the lowest degree of debasement. The pilgrims who still visited Jerusalem were exposed to insult and danger; and large contributions were exacted by their oppressors for a free passage through the Holy Land. The Mamluk Sultans of Egypt continued to rule over Palestine till the year 1382, when the country was overrun by a barbarous tribe from the interior of Asia. On their expulsion, the sovereignty of the Egyptian Sultans was again acknowledged, until the country yielded to the formidable irruption of the great Tamerlane. At his death Jerusalem reverted to the kingdom of Egypt, and was finally subdued by the Turks, under whose barbarous rule it has continued for more than 300 years. The country was partitioned into provinces, in each of which a pasha ruled with a despotic authority equal to that of the Sultan.

7. In this condition Palestine remained without any remarkable event in its history, except that for nearly three centuries it was the scene of domestic broils, insurrections and massacres, until the memorable invasion of Egypt by the French army, Bonaparte, being apprised that preparations were making in the pachalik of Acre for receiving him in Egypt, resolved, according to his usual tactics, to anticipate the movements of his enemies. He accordingly marched across the desert which divides Egypt from Palestine, and invaded the country at the head of 10,000 troops. El Arish surrendered, and the lives of the garrison were spared on condition that they should not serve against him during the war. Gaza also yielded without opposition; and Jaffa, stormed after a brave resistance, was given up to pillage. The French army then proceeded to form the siege of Acre; and this fortress, the last scene of conflict between the Christians and infidels of former days, became a modern field of battle, in which were exhibited prodigies of valour that rivalled the most renowned deeds of those chivalric times. The trenches were opened on the the 10th of March; in ten days a breach was effected, and a desperate assault took place. At first the defenders were forced to give way; but Djezzar Pasha who had shut himself within the walls, and who was aided by Sir Sidney Smith with a body of British sailors, rushed forward among the thickest of the combatants, and, animating the troops by his example, drove back the enemy with heavy loss. Bonaparte still persevered in a series of furious assaults against the fortress, which were all most gallantly repelled; and after a protracted siege of sixty days, a last assault was ordered, which being equally unsuccessful with all former attempts and attended with the loss of some of his bravest warriors, dictated the necessity of an immediate retreat.

8. In the present century a new power arose in the East, namely, that of Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt, who, having collected large treasures and a well disciplined army, openly renounced his allegiance to the Grand Signior. A war took place, in which the hasty levies of Turkey were broken and put to flight by the veteran troops of Egypt; and a series of brilliant successes added Syria, with Palestine, to the pasha's dominion. The people generally were disposed to hail the change of masters with pleasure; and by a well advised and moderate system of government, Mehemet Ali might have bound them firmly to his person and his cause. But, although in some respects an enlightened man, his notions of government were still Oriental and despotic; and the sort of European discipline and order which he had introduced into his civil and military service, was chiefly valued by him as an instrument in giving the more general and certain effect to his extortions. The Syrians soon discovered that instead of being relieved from the exactions of the Turkish government, much heavier burdens were laid upon them. The conscription, or forcible impressment of young men for the army, and the disarming of the population were, however, the measures which created the most general discontent, and led to such disturbances and revolts, as encouraged the Porte in the design which it had always entertained, of reducing the pasha and recovering the ceded provinces. Eventually a Turkish army appeared on the northern frontier of Syria, and soon came into collision with the Egyptian army under Ibrahim Pasha, eldest son of Mehemet Ali. The Turks were completely routed by the Egyptians in the battle of Nezib; and the great powers of Europe then deemed it right to interfere, to prevent Ibrahim from pursuing his victory, and to crush the ambitious designs of his father. This was accomplished chiefly through the brilliant operations of an English fleet, under Admiral Stopford and Commodore Napier, by which Acre and other strongholds on the coast were taken for the Sultan; and the pasha was at length compelled to evacuate Syria, and restore it to the dominion of the Porte, which has since administered the government of the country with greater mildness, and with less disregard of European influence, than they formerly manifested. Jerusalem, which had long been overlooked in the policy of nations, has recently become of importance in the eyes of the greatest states in the world. The five great powers of Europe have established consuls in the city, and two of them, England and Prussia, have joined to found an Anglican Episcopate, in connection with which a Protestant church has been built upon Mount Zion.—The Southern Baptist.

ROME AND CRIME.

There must either be some mistake in Paul's confident assertion, that godliness is profitable for the life that now is, or the Papal government at Rome has but very little of it; for no country in Europe exhibits such traces of wretched mismanagement and crime as the States that are under the direct government of the clergy. If the religion of Rome and the religion of Paul were identical, or had a distant relationship to each other, there could not be such an abundance of it co-existing with such an utter absence of all the legitimate fruit attributed to it by the apostle. A correspondent of the London Morning Chronicle, a paper too strongly Puseyite in its tendencies to be inclined to exaggerate a charge against Rome, presents in a late letter, the following fearful picture of the state of society under the Pope's nose:

"A murder in Italy is the talk of one day, but no more. It positively creates less sensation than the account of a broken leg or a dislocated arm, or any other casual accident; and with reason, for it is less rare. In England, a murder is posted all over the country, and supplies the inhabitants with a topic of conversation for months. Yesterday evening, (June 24th.) on returning from a walk in the country, near Ancona, I was attracted by the appearance of a strong body of police, who proceeded towards a few houses situated outside the Port Pia. On following them I found two Roman artillerymen lying weltering in their blood. Each was stabbed to the heart; the short Roman sword was still sticking in the left side of one of the unfortunate men. Each had but one wound, exactly at the heart. Their deaths had been instantaneous. A third soldier, who had also been engaged in the affray, had fled wounded. To-day the occurrence is already forgotten, and I believe that not more than a hundred persons at Ancona have heard of it. A friend here assures me, that in a small village, near which he resides, and which numbers some fifteen hundred inhabitants, there is not a family of which some member has not either been stabbed, or has committed a murder. These matters are not heard of, nor minded".

WHO WOULD NOT KNEEL IN PRAYER?

When happiness with lavish hand
Is casting flowers before us—
When Life seems void of care or pain;
And sunny skies are o'er us;
While Love and Hope are hovering near
Like angels bright and fair—
Who wou'd not then in thankfulness,
Who would not kneel in prayer?

When sorrow broods with dark-some wing
And shadows every joy—
When friendship's smile all hollow seems
And Love proves but alloy;
When o'er the tomb of buried hopes
Our hearts lie bleeding there—
Who would not on an hour like this,
Who would not kneel in prayer?

When Death's cold icy hand is laid
In terror on each form,
Who would not seek a shelter then
From every coming storm!
Who would not cast one look to heaven,
And plead for mercy there—
Who would not then imploringly,
Who would not kneel in prayer?

Scenery of Iceland

After a halt of hours, we continued our ride through the lava fields till nine o'clock, when we reached the table land, from the further end of which we could see Reikiadl, or Reikiadal, lying at our feet in a broad valley three or four miles long, shut in by a range of hills, among which glistened several jokuls (glaciers) in their icy covering.

The wild and sublime scenery of Iceland never appears to greater advantage than at the hour of sunset, when a peculiar magic light is shed over the wide valley strewn with lava, without a tree or a bush, and hemmed in by dark mountains, whose summits glitter in the last rays of the departing sun; the jokuls are veiled by a shade of delicate rose, while the deepest shadows gather around the lower part of the hills, in striking contrast to the plains, over which floats a purple haze, imparting to them the appearance of a dark sheet of water. The silence, the perfect solitude, are still more impressive. Not a sound is heard, not a living creature is in sight, not a village, a single cottage, a tree, a shrub. The whole landscape is absolutely devoid of every sign of life; and as the eye wanders over the boundless and monotonous scene, it seeks in vain for any object of familiar interest on which to rest.

As we reached the extremity of the table land this evening about eleven o'clock, I saw a sunset which I can never forget. The hills, the valleys, and the glaciers were lighted up by a brilliant red; I could not remove my eyes from the glowing mountains, although the view at my feet had many claims to my attention and adoration.

The whole long valley was almost entirely covered with meadows, at its extreme end columns of smoke were seen to rise from the boiling springs. The atmosphere was so clear and pure, so much more transparent than I have ever seen it in an other country, that the light seemed to be very little diminished by the disappearance of the, and I observed that the smallest objects were distinctly visible on the plain, a circumstance which was very favorable to our progress, for the road was full of danger, leading as it did abruptly down over the stones and rocks into the valley below. A small stream on one side of us formed several pretty falls, some of which were thirty feet high.—Madame Pfreiffer's Iceland.

OUR FATHER.

It was the Emperor Marcus Antonius who exclaimed, "God the Father of his people." Who would live in a world uninhabited by the gods?" If, to the mind of a Pagan, the idea of an orphaned world was so sad that he rejected it with horror, how can we believe those sincere who affirm that they have no vestiges of an all-wise, Almighty mind in things around them? It was another view which the lovely Cowper took, when gazing abroad at the manifold works of Jehovah, he wrote,

"My Father made them all."

That word "Father" in the Lord's Prayer touches the tender chord of adoring love. It suggests the relation believers realize in that word "Abba," Father. It is not my, but our Father. Here we see the communion of saints illustrated by the one offering of this prayer.—Chris Intel

Motion that we will hear the report of B. V. R. James, Esqr. Mr. James, made a statement of the doings, of the Mass meeting held at Virginia, on the 12th, inst: Which he did in a most concise way as possible. And regretted much that he had to make such a random report.

Motion that the report of Mr. James, be received.

The Hon: A. F. Russell, arose and enquired of the gentlemen who held the meeting in Monrovia, previous to the Mass meeting in Virginia, What they had in view, in appointing delegates to that meeting? Mr. Russell, said, he knew how they stood up the St. Paul's, in favour of the present administration. But he had heard so many reports up the river. * * * about our party, in Monrovia, that at one time, it was reported by some, of the opposite party up the river, that nine tenths of the people on the Cape, had turned in favour of the opposite party. The hon: gentleman spoke also, of some falsehoods which had been put in circulation, in opposition to the present administration, which they had met in town meetings for the purpose of refuting; and which was successfully done.

Hon: J. B. Mc Gill, Mr. Solomon Morton, Isaac Scott, and others, made short speeches on the occasion.

The following Resolutions were adopted.

Resolved.—That this meeting have entire confidence in J. J. Roberts and that we will do all in our power to secure his fourth election to the Presidency, and Stephen A. Benson, for the Vice Presidency.

Resolved.—That a committee be appointed to name whom the administration party will support for Senator and the report of that committee will direct us in our voting.

Resolved.—That the Chairman of this meeting will nominate the committee.

Resolved.—That we are determined to support the candidates who are named for the House of Representatives.

The Committee appointed to determine on candidates, whom the administration, party will support for Senator, and Representatives named the following gentlemen, as the committee.

Hon: J. B. Mc Gill,	G. Moore,
T. Travis,	R. Dingerfield,
S. Morton,	I. Lawrence,
I. Scott	I. J. Sanders,

The above named Committee, retired for a short time.

Committee's Report.

We the committee appointed to determine upon the Candidates for the Senate and house of Representatives, have determined on the following persons.

For Senator.
A. F. Russell,

Representatives—
B. V. R. James,

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor:

I have written these lines of poetry in congratulation to the two lawyers, who plead pro and con on the case of Boombo. Only persevere, and in a few years there will be educated Liberians, to equal those of other nations. Colored men have always labored under so many disadvantages, that even those who had education, were obliged to keep it hid under a bushel. But now, thank God it can be placed upon a candlestick, and shine over the world. Then don't let us wait till we have mastered Greek, before we begin to let the world know what we are; let us commence at once, and do all the good we can, by enlighting others. We who live at the present, don't expect to do much to extend education, but we should try to lay the foundation; and if there are any of us who have the ability, to distinguish ourselves in any particular branch of education, let us do so.—But not to boast of our education—nor for the name of a learned man—not to scorn those who have it not—nor to receive any more honor, than what is due; but it should be for the good of our country, and the rising generation.

Were it not for some admissions allowed in poetry, which are not admitted in prose, very few men would undertake this tedious work; but at last we must say, that genius and art constitute the best poet; and if those two ingredients are not jointly united, all our efforts will fail. This, who will dispute?

Lawyers—Draper & Phillips.

Dra—Judge, jury, sir, and fellow citizens:
You have heard all the witnesses have said;
And now it's enjoined, on me in advance,
The law, and the testimony, of course,
The case of Boombo's, though criminal one;
May not appear so, when the law's explained:
The criminal's lawyer, may at the bar plead.
But the laws of this country, we will hold.
That Boombo has made, a treaty with us;
And war, he's forbidden to fight unless
He first sends to this Republic, and know,

If one in his favor, will justice show
His has been the case! No sir, he has slain
A centre, by burning, and killing its once;
Both woman and children, he has destroy'd
And who can say where, he has buried the dead?
It don't need much pleading, the case is plain,
For truly this man has hid, most people slain.

Phill.—I rose to plead for Boombai, who's a be on;
You have him here indicted, for high treason,*
Firing fire, burning, killing and the like—
You have them all summ'd up, and here to take,
The life of him, who he stands at the bar:
Before the court, and all the men at large,
Asking for mercy, k through us doth plead;
We hope the court will hear us in his stead;
We think he is indicted quite unfair;
We've look'd into our Code, to see it clear;
But we can nothing see, which will agree,
With what you there have done, and think it free.
This man is Chief, and by the high laws—
There are three classes, by which men are known;
But in this case, there's no distinction made;
Whether he's Chief, or one of common rank;
If he's a Chief, can he not call his men?
And send them where he chose, it into Man?
Your honor: I have not arose to plead—
But ope the case; and then I shall proceed,
To plead the case; when I can rise again,
And do the best I can, the case to win.

Dra—Again I rise upon my feet to make,
A few remarks, then I'll be glad to rest;
That man is guilty—if you spare his life,
We'll be in danger, in the streets at night;
He is a murderer, and it's proven—
By the witness last upon his feet.
Who said, "I saw one man cut down mrs B;"
Another said: "They came and took my husband,"
"And when I spoke they came, and ran at me;"
"I stretche my arms, where I might grasp my gun;"
When I was told to, let them all go on.
"Else they might curb, and also take me long."
Can we bear this, from that Mr Boombai!
Who's running to and fro, like a bear—
Laying the country waste, at his own will.
No:—rather let us take him, and he file,
The office of a prisoner, in our jail;
And if we do not, then we will fail,
To let the nations see, where power lay—
By which we exercise, upon these shades.

Phill.—Honorable Court! and men of jury;
According to our custom, and our rules
It with Defendent laws, to close the case.
Much has been said, in order to condemn,
The prisoner who doth stand, before you men;
But you have judgments, weigh the case at large;
This gentleman, has never been raised 'mong us
His friends are here, and they are friends to us;
Can any say that death should be his doom?
While graves are deep, and men all dread its gloom!
Oh set him free;—but this you will not do;
Then do to him, as you would wish to you,
It's not for money that I plead his case;
Nor am I actuated by his cents,
I feel like this man has, some need of help;
And that he is not guilty, 'nough for death.
Then I'll appeal to you his jury men,
And to the Judge, who sits upon this case;
If there is any doubt upon your mind;
Then give it to Defendent, for such,
Are there no doubts?—
Have these things all been clearly prov'd to you?
Then I will wholly leave the case with you:
Peruse it well, and then what e'er you see,
Make out your verdict just as it should be.

A friend to the Republic.

* Having just received and read a portion of the Liberia Herald, I find that Boombai was indicted for High Misdemeanor instead of High Treason.'

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, APRIL 19th, 1853.

We have been favored with the loan of the "Illustrated London News," of 12th and 19th March—from which we make the following extracts.—

"The excitement in Washington on the 4th, was excessive. So great was the excitement to witness General Pierce's inauguration, as President, that on the previous night, hundreds of persons, including ladies, slept in the Rotunda of the Capitol, while thousands walked the streets, determined to be sufficently early, or they would be unable to obtain accommodation in the hotel. General Pierce was escorted by a procession to the Senate House—he stood erect in the carriage with President Fillmore by his side, surrounded by Marshals—Foreign Ministers followed in carriages.—At the eastern front of the Capitol, where an immense stage was erected, sufficiently large to accommodate all—the Marshal of the district, with the Judges of the Supreme Court, followed by the President and President elect, and the entire assemblage in the Senate, assembled, and the oath of office was administered to General Pierce by the Chief Justice, in the following words."

"I do solemnly affirm that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

General Pierce in taking the oath did not, as had been ordinarily the custom say, 'I solemnly swear," but "I solemnly affirm," and instead of kissing the book, in the Southern fashion, he raised his right hand, and held it in that position until the pledge was read. "Immediately before the address," "says the describer of the scene."

When General Pierce took the oath, with head uncovered, and rasing one hand to heaven, while he laid the other on the Holy Book, the spectators, also uncovered even in the snow that was falling at the time, and many of them lifted up their hands as if in an act of the most fervent devotion. The address which the President delivered unfalteringly from memory, and without a single note, was received with great enthusiasm, by the vast multitude, particularly those portions of it that asserted the Monroe doctrine, the protection of American citizens abroad, the firm adherence of the President to the Slave Trade. Cries of "Good, good," and other warm expressions of admiration were elicited from the crowd. The sentiments, the tone of the address, the earnest manner in which it was spoken; his beautiful actions: his manly erect appearance; his pale cast of countenance, in which intellect and courage were the predominating features; and his clear, loud voice, distinctly heard by the remotest of his audience, all combined to make a deep impression in favor of General Pierce; and many asserted that this was the best inaugural address ever delivered from that spot. He is undoubtedly a very effective speaker.

After the conclusion of the usual formalities, President Pierce stepped to the platform, and, amid enthusiastic cheers, proceeded to deliver the Inaugural address, of which we give the most important portions. His opening sentence contained a brief, but touching allusion to the afflicting domestic calamity which he has so recently sustained:—

"My countrymen,—It is a relief to feel that no heart but my own knows the personal regret and bitter sorrow, over which I have been borne to a position so suitable for others than desirable for myself. Whether the elements of inherent force in the Republic, have kept pace with its unparalleled progress in territory, population and wealth, had been the subject of earnest thought and discussion on both sides of the ocean. The actual working of our system has, however, dispelled a degree of solicitude which at the outset disturbed bold hearts, and far reaching intellects. The apprehension of dangers from extended territory, multiplied States, accumulated wealth, and augmented population, has proved to be unfounded. The stars upon your banner have become nearly threefold their original number, your densely populated possessions skirt the shores of the two great oceans, and yet this vast increase of people and territory has not only shown itself compatible with the harmonious action of the States, and the Federal Government in the respective constitutional spheres, but has afforded an additional guarantee of the strength and integrity of both.

With an experience thus suggestive and cheering, the policy of my administration will not be controled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised that our attitude as a nation, and position on the globe, render the acquisition of certain possessions, not within our jurisdiction, eminently important for our protection, if not, in the future, essential for the preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world, should they be obtained, it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to obvious national interest and security, and in a manner entirely consistent with the strictest observance of national faith. We have nothing in our history or position to invite aggression: we have every thing to beckon us to the cultivation of relations of peace and amity with all nations. Purposes, thereto, at once just and pacific, will be significantly marked in the conduct of our foreign affairs. A sound and comprehensive policy should embrace not less the distant future than the urgent present.

The great objects of our pursuits, as a people, are best to be attained by peace, and are entirely consistent with the tranquility and interests of the rest of mankind. With the neighboring nations upon our continent we should cultivate kindly and fraternal relations. We can desire nothing in regard to them so much as to see them consolidate their strength and pursue the paths of prosperity and happiness. If, in the course of their growth, we should need channels of trade and create additional facilities for friendly intercourse, the benefits realized will be equal and mutual. Of the complications of European systems of national policy we have heretofore been independent. From their wars, their animosities, and anxieties, we have been fully almost entirely exempt. While these are confined to the nations which gave them existence, and within their legitimate jurisdiction, they cannot affect us, except as they appeal to our sympathies as in the cause of human freedom and universal advancement. But the vast interests of commerce are common to all mankind; and the advantages of trade and international intercourse, must allways present a noble field for the moral influence of a great power.

With these views firmly and honestly carried out, we have a right, to expect, and shall under all circumstances require prompt reciprocity. The rights which belong to us as a nation, are not alone to be regarded, but those which pertain to every citizen in his individual capacity, at home and abroad, must be sacredly maintained. So long as he discern every star in its place upon that ensign, without wealth to purchase for him preferment or title, to secure for him a place, it will be his privilege, and must be his acknowledged right, to stand unabashed even in the presence of princes, with a proud consciousness that himself is one of a nation of sovereigns, and that he cannot, in legitimate pursuit, wander so far from home that the agent whom he shall leave behind in the place, which I now occupy will not see that no rude hand of power or tyranical passion is laid upon him with impunity. He must realize that, upon every sea and on every soil, where our enterprise may rightfully seek the protection of our flag. American citizenship is an inviolable panoply for the security of American rights. And in this connexion it can hardly be necessary to re-affirm a principle which should now be regarded as fundamental. The rights, security and repose of this Confederacy reject the idea of interference or colonization on this side of the ocean by any foreign Power, beyond present jurisdiction, as utterly inadmissible.

I believe that involuntary servitude, as it exist in different States of this confederecy, is recognized by the constitution. I believe that it stands like any other admitted right, and the State wherein it exists are entitled to efficient remedies to enforce the constituted provisions. I hold that the laws of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, are strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect. I believe that the constituted authorities of this Republic are bound to regard the rights of the South in this respect, as they would view any other legal and constitutional rights; and that the laws to enforce them should be respected and obeyed, not with a reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society, but cheerfully, and according to the decisions of the tribunal to which their exposition belongs. Such have been and are my convictions, and upon them I shall act. I fervently hope that the question is at rest, and that no sectional, or ambitious, or fanatical excitement may again threaten the durability of our institutions, or obscure the light of our prosperity."

The President concluded his Address as follows—

"Standing, as I do, almost within view of the green slopes of Monticello, and as it were, within reach of the tomb of Washington, with all the cherished memories of the past gathering around me, like so many eloquent voices of exhortation from Heaven, I can express no better hope for my country than that kind Providence which smiled upon our fathers may enable their children to preserve the blessings they have inherited."

Great cheering and firing succeeded the Address. On the conclusion of the ceremonies, the President was escorted to the White House, where he held a kind of levee. The proceedings of the day closed with a private dinner at the White House. Ex-President Fillmore quietly returned to the apartments in the hotel, where President Pierce had resided.

POETRY

The Coming of the Stage Coach.

The distant wheels roll up the street,
A horn sounds on the hill,
Out springs the farmer from his wheat,
The miller from his mill;
The village beauty, Anatel,
Smooths back her shining hair,
Her heart beats quick—she cannot tell
"Somebody" may be there.
The "host" grows merry, as the horn
Rings on the even tide.
The milk-maids hidden by the corn,
Haste from the heifer's side;
The white-haired dame lays by her flax,
The blacksmith's ore grows pale,
The cobler leaves his bench and wax,
And John throws down his flail.
On roll the wheels, the clattering hoofs
Fall fast upon the road,
Nor cease till 'neath the old Inn roofs,
They bear the wearied load;
How gather now the aged sires,
The latest news to hear;
To tales of crime, of flood, or fires,
They lend an eager ear.
'Tis night—the moon shines full and white,
On the dark brow of earth;
And many a heart beats free and light,
Round many a cottage hearth,
The messengers of myraid joys,
Come with that stage coach old,
Letters from brave and wandering boys,
And some brought chests of gold.
And pretty Nelly, blushing stands
Beneath the drooping vine;
"Somebody" fondly clasps her hands,
And whispers, "you'll be mine."
Her brow is bright with happy years,
O! may few sorrows dim
Those soft blue eyes, that look thro' tears
So tenderly on him.—Lynchburg Weekly Express

ANNIHILATION OF SUNS

The progress of astronomy is bringing, in unexpected ways, confirmation to the Scriptures. No one would have expected, considering the impression that have prevailed, touching "the immutability of the starry spheres"—no one would have expected to hear of such events as those of new suns coming forth with sudden brilliancy in the skies, and of other suns long observed, fading away—of others robbed of half their radiance within the period of a few weeks—of others growing gradually to five fold brightness, then bursting forth into surpassing lustre, and then gradually fading away, as in a dying conflagration. And being informed of such events, we should not, at the first glance see that the facts were applicable to elucidate and confirm the Scriptures

But let us look at the facts. What the Greek astronomer Hipparchus recorded, as the birth of a new star of extraordinary brilliancy, though done less true, and the like events recorded by the Chinese might have been regarded as fabulous, were it not that modern science has occasion for like records. Tycho Brahe describes the one which he saw, as follows:—

"Leaving my laboratory in the evening, and raising my eyes as usual to the well-known vault of heaven, I observed with indescribable astonishment, near the zenith, a radiant fixed star of a magnitude never before seen. In my amazement I doubted the evidence of my senses. However to convince myself that it was no allusion, and to have the testimony of others, I summoned my assistants from my laboratory, and inquired of them, and all the country people that passed by, if they also observed the star that had suddenly burst forth. I afterwards heard, that in Germany, wagoners and other common people had first called the attention of astronomers to it. This star I found to be perfectly like all other fixed stars, except that it scintillated more strongly."

This is characteristic of new stars. He further said that the light of it was so strong, as to be seen in the day time, and often to be seen through clouds that obscured the other stars. It was also immovable and fixed. Then its brilliancy began to diminish, and continued to diminish, till it came down to a star of the sixth magnitude, and till it entirely disappeared. It had shone seventeen months, when it could no longer be seen by the naked eye.

Sir John Herschell also describes the appearance of temporary stars, which have blazed forth in the heavens, and then died away and left no trace. And he adds to the description of this one, the fact, that the pencil were found by Tycho Brahe gazing at a star that did not exist half an hour before. Humboldt counts as twenty-one of these new stars which have been observed in the world within two thousand years. Besides these new stars, there are others long familiar to astronomers, which have disappeared. Of such cases, Herschell says:—"It is certain, that there is no mistake in the observation or entry; and that the star has been really observed, and has disappeared from the heavens." There is also a list of thirty-six variable stars, observed within the last two hundred and fifty years. The alternations of brightness in the star Eta Argus are surprising. Now it is a star of the fourth magnitude, now of the second, and afterwards of the first; and afterwards it suddenly increased so as to surpass in brilliance all the stars. Then again it diminished, and afterwards, two years ago, it increased so as to nearly equal Sirius in splendor. While these additions of splendor were made to one star, another, the star Alpha, lost nearly half ist light in six weeks.

From these and other phenomena, Humboldt infers that the luminous atmospheres of the fixed stars, that is, the suns of other systems are generally subject to changes, which most often, but not always, occur in immensely long periods. And that what we no longer see is not annihilated. It is merely the transmission of matter into new forms. And dark bodies may, by a new process, become luminous. And La Place says:—"These stars that have become invisible after having surpassed the brilliancy of Jupiter, have not changed their place during the time of their being invisible."

That the fixed stars, that is, the suns, do thus change, and suspend their light, or pass to and from a luminous condition is not a matter of mere theory or guesses. It is a fact palpable to the senses—a fact acknowledged by the highest authorities—such as La Place, Herschel, Humboldt and Arago. And this fact being settled, removes what has been the greatest difficulty in bringing the conclusions of geology into harmony with the Scriptures. Geology makes it clear that the sun had shone upon the earth myreads of ages before creation week. Then it is asked, How could the earth, after this, have been under darkness, and have had need of a new supply of light? We answer, the light of the sun was extinguished, or removed from the earth for the time. And here we seem to lay an insupportable tax on incredulity. To put out the sun for the sake of bringing Scripture and geology into harmony, seems to be a work of great violence. We seem to be asking too much.

But when we come to know that the extinction and rekindling of suns is but a common occurrence, and when by familiarity with the changes passing in the starry heavens, the mind can follow the hand of the Creator, lighting and putting out suns as we would tapers, all difficulty vanishes. And we can see that nothing was more probable than that our sun passed for a while from its luminous condition, and left its family of dependent worlds, to darkness. And as other suns at different times shine with varying intensity, so our sun in former periods, might have sent forth more light and heat answering to the warmer conditions of the earth in former periods.

The chaotic period preceding Genesis was one of universal darkness and death, just as such a change in the sun must have brought in. And to such changes Humboldt ascribes the geological condition of the alternations of heat and cold so extensive, as at one period to have clothed high northern latitudes with more than tropical luxuriance of vegetation, and at another to have buried vast tracts of mid le Europe, now enjoying a genial climate and smiling with fertility, under a glacier crust of enormous thickness. * * In the slow secular variations of our supply of light and heat from the sun, which in the immensity of the past may have gone to any extent, and succeeded each other in any order, which we know to have taken place, we have a cause fully adequate to the utmost requirements of geology."—Watchman & Reflector

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Five great nations are said to be represented in Constantinople, viz: the Turks and Greeks, the Armenians, Jews and French. The latter, it is said, include every sort that wears hat. Former'y, a correspondent of the St. Louis Intelligencer the different classes of subjects were easily distinguished by their dress, each article, for each race, being more or less the subject of sumptuary enactment. But now all such distinctions have vanished away; and the old Turks complain that they do not know whom to knock about, and otherwise abuse and snub upon in the streets, and upon whom to bestow the contemptuous epithet of giavor, Mussulmen, Jews, and Christians all look alike in the new dress. The turban and kaftan have been displaced by a simple red cap of woollen, fitted closely to the head, with a blue silk tassel waving behind from the top, and no peak or rim to protect the face from the sun; and the flowing robes and noble breeches, by frock coat and pantaloons. When the change was first made, it was required that all besides the Mussulmen, should have the mark of a black crescent in a conspicuous place on the cap, but even this is now entirely done away with."

The writer adds:—"But I hear you ask, what do you mean by kalkap? The head dress of the Armenians was formerly called by this name, and it was made of heavy wool, with a fine curl dyed black, and stiffened with pasteboard and leather, inside, and its shape was as near as possible that of an old fashioned iron teakettle, deprived of its spout and handle, and inverted. Twenty, and even fifteen years ago, every adult male American in the city were one of these unsightly head covers, while now not one is to be seen, and I really believe that the man who should wear one in the streets would be hooted at by the boys. By the law of affinities, which the Turks has very wisely sanctioned in this case, each of these different classes of the population, occupies separate quarters of the city; that is to say, not that there is one great quarter for each, (for there are several,) but that whenever one family of any one class is found there is almost sure to be a whole neighborhood, either smaller or larger of the same class. No intermarriages are allowed, and there is almost no social intercourse between the different classes. One peculiarity which would strike an American is, that among the Turks and Armenians there is no commingling of the two sexes in society. When male visitors are present in any house, the female members of the family never make their appearance, and males and females never sit down to eat at the same table, according to ancient custom. This separation of the two sexes in society is baleful in its influence, as it is easy to see it must be, on both parties.—Dicknell's Reporter

INDIA AND IRELAND—A PARALLEL.

About 30 years ago there existed in India an organized, professional body of murderers, known by the name of Thugs. Travellers, both honest men and robbers, being permitted to pass daily unquestioned from one end of India to the other, it happened that the travelling murderers murdered the honest travellers at a distance from their homes and burying the bodies with artistic skill, no one remained to tell the tale—the best local magistrates knew nothing of the murderers or the murdered. Such was the system of Thuggee, to which were sacrificed sometimes 20, or more victims at a time. In the native states, however, the Thugs were not left unmolested; they were often without any particular accusation, searched and roughtly dealt with; and frequently some dreadful punishment was inflicted on them. But in the territories under British rule they shared the general personal liberty of the subject. The consequence was that this crime kept on increasing, till at last, becoming absolutely intolerable, effectual measures were adopted for its suppression.

Accordingly a peculiar police was established for the purpose under Colonel Sleaman. It principally worked by a great system of approversmen, whose lives were spared on condition of their faithfully serving the government, and to the accuracy of whose statements many tests were applied. The superintendents of the new police were entirely freed from the ordinary restraints. They were permitted to retain prisoners for any length of time—to separate them to different parts of the country—to make them over to the old approvers, and to worm the truth out of them. The assistants to the superintendents were stationed in different parts of the country, and sent out their parties with approvers on detective expeditions. Accurate lists were made of all persons satisfactorily denounced as professional criminals, and who were to be seized wherever found and the motions of the different gangs were traced and followed all over India. The first gang through whom anything effectual was discovered was kept seven years under trial before anything could be established against them. At the end of that time they confessed, and turned approvers. All the information they could give was taken advantage of. Many were seized, many confessed many stories were established by strong corroborative evidence. A large number of criminals were convicted. Many punished, and many made approvers. The approvers had life, but no actual liberty. Those who did good service had many indulgences. The stories were rested by the discovery of bodies and of property, the verification of the loss of travellers to whose murders they confessed. The account given by one Thug was compared with that of another somewhere in a prison 1,000 miles off, and his with another somewhere else, and altogether so minute a system of checks was established, that with really efficient supervision falsehood became almost impossible. We beg our readers to mark the result—all the professional Thugs were seized and suppressed, and the end desired was admirably attained.

Now there not only has existed, but there still exists, in Ireland, an organized body of professional murderers, known by the name of Ribbonmen. These Ribbonmen form themselves into tribunals, and condemn certain persons to death. They find in some part of the country, a distance from the residence of the doomned person, some man or men who are to do the deed, often unwillingly. At noon-day, in the public road, in the midst of a teeming population, sentence of the Ribbon tribunal is carried out—the victim lies dead in the Queen's highway, and the surrounding population see the murderers retreat without an attempt to arrest them—some witness the scene with approbation—but we believe by far the greater number are passive through fear. This is the system which the British government tolerates, and has tolerated for years and years.

The object of the actors in this system is as well known as it is disastrous—it is to preserve the predominance of the Popish religion in Ireland, and to deter Englishmen and Scotchmen from settling in the country. It is this system which prevents capital being invested in Ireland; it is fatal to Irish prosperity, and most injurious to the general well-being of the empire. Nevertheless, obvious and disastrous as are these results, England, we say, tolerates the system—tolerates is the right word to use. Who can for a moment doubt that as we have crushed Indian Thuggee, in a similar way we could crush, in a tenth part of the time, and with an infinitely less effort, Irish Ribbonism? British subjects in India amount to upwards of 100 000,000. The superficial area is nearly 1,250 000 of square miles; the distance from England 4,000 miles. On the other hand British subjects in Ireland are 6,500,000. The superficial area is only 32,000 square miles—the distance not more than 60 miles. Are we, then, to be old at this time of day that what the British government has accomplished so successfully, amidst such an enormous population, scattered over so vast a territory at a distance of 4,000 miles from the seat of the Imperial government, cannot be accomplished in Ireland close at hand, even at our doors, amidst so comparitively small a population, occupying so small a territorial area? The notion is ridiculous. Of course it can be done, if we only set to work in the right way. Let a peculiar police be established; worm the truth out of the suspected, and try the truth of their stories by every imaginable test. By the existing law every man who sits on a Ribbon tribunal which dooms a man to death is guilty of murder, as an accessory before the fact. Have we not plenty of Colonel Sleamans, who will be able to discern those who compose the tribunal? Once proved, against them, however numerous they may be, pitilessly hang them, one and all, upon the spot where the victim fell. Moreover, punish the priest who receives the confession, and absolves the murderer, as far as the law will allow, as an accessory after the fact; but, as we have before now said, admit the murderer as an approver.—Thus will you strike at the system, for the punishment of the instrument is useless.

In India we had the good sense to set a greater value on the peace and security of society than on the maudin nonsense which is talked about the 'liberty of the subject.' We knew that the liberty to honest men to travel in safety was a liberty far more to be prized than the personal liberty of the Thug; we had no spurious sympathy with poor suffering guilt.' We did our duty, and freed that vast peninsula from the greatest curse with which it was ever afflicted.

But it may be said, no Government can obtain from Parliament the necessary powers to do the like in Ireland; but, we would humbly ask, has any Government tried to obtain them? When they have been asked for and refused it will be quite time enough to say that they cannot be obtained. For ourselves we do not believe that any government coming down honestly to solicit from the legislature means to put down for ever this accursed system would be refused what they asked.—The Pope's Brigade would doubtless throw every obstacle in the way, but the calm coolness of the Irish Attorney General would easily prevail against them. Conscious of the vileness of their cause, their craven spirits would quail before his eagle eye.—Where is the man out of that brigade who would dare to raise his voice to protect a system of murder?

We say, then, try the experiment. If properly carried out the soil of Ireland will no longer be stained with those frightful and appalling outrages.—The Imperial Reporter and Fermanagh Farmer's Journal.

The Maiden's Choice

A tale of Filial Affection.

ALICE DEMPSTER was what is called a pretty comely girl. She was not beautiful; but she still could have scarcely passed along the streets—even in England, where beauty is perhaps less rare than in any country—without being noticed. She was the daughter of a poor widow, in a village in Devonshire—that picturesque and charming country. Mrs. Dempster had been the wife of a sailor, who, out of his earnings, had bought a cottage in his native hamlet, in which his widow resided after his death. She had little else save this cottage except her daughter, who was indeed a treasure of affection and love. But then Alice was one of those frail and delicate beings who give pain while they do pleasure to a parent's heart. From about twelve to eighteen her mother was her devoted nurse. Never was pale face, or hectic cough, or meagre form, or constant langour, watched with more intense anxiety by a parent's eye; it seemed never off the young girl's face. Mrs Dempster had a lodger, and he came off rather badly; but he never grumbled or complained; he would, on the contrary, sit with the poor widow, and comfort her under her affliction, with a rude kindness of manner which soon won her heart. John Morrison was a railway clerk, with a small salary at a station about a mile off. He had lived with Mrs. Dempster six years and had mainly directed the education of little Alice. Of a studious and serious turn of thought, he spent all his liesure hours in reading. Mrs. Dempster had sent Alice to school when a mere child; but a village educational establishment is not usually the place to learn much in, and that of Dame Potter was not an exception. But John Morrison took a fancy to the little Alice; and finding her fond of study and her book, took great pains with her.

About the age of eighteen Alice out grew her ailments. Her cheeks filled out, her eyes became lustrous and clear; her cheeks were rosy and blooming; but Mrs Dempster began to feel the effects of her long vigils and constant watching. She moved about with the tread of an old woman; her appetite began to fail her, and positions were gradually reversed. Before three months, a cozy arm chair in the bright sun, by an open window, was the usual place of the mother; while Alice bustled about, did the work of the house, and attended to the invalid. Mrs. Dempster had no particular illness; she was simply worn out with anxiety and fatigue. But if she suffered she had also her reward, for Alice was now her devoted nurse.

But Alice was eighteen, and pretty, I have said and the men made the discovery as well as her mother. John Morrisson, a sedate and grave young man of eight-and-twenty—himself remarked it to Mrs. Dempster, as did soon many others. In the neighborhood were several extensive farms, and, among others one belonging to Mr. Clifton. Mr. Clifton was very rich, and had two sons. Walter and Edward. Walter was very handsome, lively, pleasant fellow, full of generous impulses, but somewhat too fond of riotous pleasure, of the bottle, and of cards With plenty of money at his disposal, he was the centre of a group of frolickers that were, on many occasions, the alarm of the whole county. Walter Clifton was the wildest of the lot. It is true that he was generous; if he broke a head or damaged a field, he paid the expense: and if he broke a heart he was sorry for it. One hot summer's day, Alice was sitting sewing by her mother's side; the window open, and the warm air poured in upon the face of the invalid. Her eyes were pleasantly fixed on the honey-suckle, jasmin, and clematis, which twined round the window, and the rose-trees that filled the strip of garden before the house, but more pleasantly still on the innocent sweet face of her child. Suddenly two horsemen pulled up before the window; they had often been noticed before, but this was the first time they had ever halted

"Mrs. Dempster," said a dark, handsome young man, while the other, a fair youth, held back and blushed,—"we have pulled up to ask for a drink of milk or beer, or any thing you can give us. It is a long time since we have drank anything in your house, but it will be with pleasure we shall renew the custom."

"Welcome welcome, Master Clifton," replied Mrs. Dempster without rising; "it is indeed a long time since you used to come and listen to me and husband's stories, and drink his goat's milk."

"A long time; when your daughter Alice there was six years old," replied Clifton, "and Ned and I were sprigs of boys. Poor Mr. Dempster, we missed him very much when we came home from school."

"He often talked of you when he came home from his voyages," said Mrs. Dempster, as the young men were shown in by Alice.

"I suppose you have forgotten us, continued Walter addressing Alice, by whom he had sat down

"No," exclaimed the young girl, blushing: "I have forgotten neither of my old friends—Wally nor Ned."

Meanwhile Alice was bustling about, preparing a plain but wholesome lunch of bread and cheese, to which the gentlemen did ample justice. This done they remained an hour in conversation; Walter chiefly addressing himself to Alice, Edward to the mother.

From that day, Walter became a regular, Edward an occasional visitor. Walter soon allowed his admiration of Alice to peep forth; he lost no opportunity of speaking with his eyes, and soon began to whisper words of affection. Alice listened with downcast looks, but made scarcely any reply. After about a month, Mrs. Dempster asked him to take tea and spend the evening. She perceived the dawning passion which was rising on both sides; and as she saw no disproportion, except in fortune, between a rich farmer and a merchant captain's daughter, she was inclined to foster the feeling for her child's sake John Morrison was to be of the party; Mrs. Dempster had confided to him her secret; and after one or two objections to the character of the young man, he consented to be present. It was about an hour before tea-time when he came to this resolution; and as soon as he had done so, he went into the garden.

John Morrison was a pale, good looking man, of moderate stature. He had no pretensions to be handsome, but none would have looked at him without noticing his marked and speaking countenance; to admire, not its beauty but its power and intellect. But why is he now so overcast and sad? Let us listen we may hear

"And is it for this I have trained her up? Is it for this I have devoted my existence to her for several years,—for in the girl I saw the dawning woman,—to be the victim of the wild and reckless youth, who will break her heart? But she will be rich, easy, comfortable. Well? if she could be happy I should be glad; but Walter Clifton loves with the love of a boy,—a love of impulse,—give him his toy and he will break it!'

"What are you talking to yourself about so freely?" cried Alice tripping from behind some bushes where she had been cutting flowers for the evening. "But how pale and ill you look! Shall I get you anything!"

"No, Alice. I am very well in body, but the mind is ill at ease."

"Are you ill, John?—my friend, my brother—"

"Ah yes?" cried he, passionately, "there it is; I have been a fool; I have taught you to treat me as a brother, and the idea could never enter your head of thinking of me as aught else"

"Certainly not," said Alice!" anxiously.

"But it had mine, Alice" cried John, forgetting all reserve and prudence, "ever since you were twelve years old, I looked on you as one who might be my future wife. Six years have passed away, six long and happy years,—nearly seven,—during which, each day I have loved you more and more. I waited and waited, putting off the day of declaration until you were quite a young woman; and it is now too late."

Alice groaned astounded, hurt, and pained to the last degree.

"Too late," said the usually calm young man, in tones of deep and wildly passionate feeling, "and all my dreams are fled. I hoped, if heaven blessed me with your affection, to be united to you on your nineteenth birthday; we could then have made my two rooms upstairs ours, and have left your mother yours. She would have found no change, save that in place of one child she would have two."

"Oh John John! why did you not speak before? I never thought—I never supposed—I—I—"

"Alice it was not to be. So, no more of it. I must go away—not just yet, it would startle your dear mother, but by-and-by"

"My friend, my brother," exclaimed Alice, as she gazed on his palid face, flashing eyes, and trembling lip.

"Say no more, dear girl. Be happy with the man of your choice. You have the prayers and good wishes of John Morrison"

And the young man turned away, and went up to his room. An hour later he sat down to the tea-table of Mrs Dempster, far calmer than poor Alice, who scarcely had courage to look up. The talk was varied, and generally trifling. Walter not being one of those who can think sufficiently serious to converse any other way. Presently he spoke of a grand subscription ball for the following Thursday, to which he invited Alice, in the name of his mother and sisters, who would call for her in their old fashioned carriage.

"But I cannot go," said Alice, quietly, while, despite herself, her eyes flashed with pleasure at the idea: "my mother cannot remain alone; besides I dance very indifferently"

"My dear Alice," said John, in a kind tone, "I will take care of your mamma. We will sit up for you until any hour of the night: go; it will do you good, you who never go out."

"Yes: go by all means," added Mrs. Dempster.

"You cannot refuse," continued Walter, shaking Morrison's hand heartily. "I, Mary, and Jane will be round at seven; so mind,—be ready."

After he had gone there were rare discussions that night. Alice had no dress to go in; that had never been thought of. Mrs. Dempster thought more of her daughter than of herself, it is true, but a ball dress is a serious affair with persons of small income. After supper the debate was resumed, but with no satisfactory result, so all went to bed. About eleven o'clock next day, while Alice was turning out all her finery in search of something suitable a man entered with a parcel for Mrs. Dempster. It contained a beautiful ball dress, sent by Morrison, who had risen early, and gone into town on purpose to purchase it. Alice turned pale, and sat down; but, recovering herself, bent over the kind present to hide her tears. Mrs. Dempster—good and proud mother—was in ecstacies, both at the dress and the donor, and immediately sat down to a table to begin cutting out manner and tone, but by no word or look did he

When John came home that night his greeting was indeed hearty and warm. The mother declared that he was more than a son to her while Alice said scarce a word. Her look however, was eloquent indeed. It expressed, gratitude, pity, sorrow,—a thousand mingled shades of feeling which words could not have expressed. John was rather serious in his manner and tone, but by no word or look did he betray his peculiar state of feelings. He sat reading to them all that evening, while they worked at the dress; and even made pleasant and jocular remarks on Alice's taste for finery and dancing, with such success as to remove from the young girl's mind all remains of uneasiness. She was the more easily consoled, that John seemed to her rather too old to be her husband.—Walter was three-and-twenty, John twenty-eight; Walter was handsome, John was plain; the one was lively and gay, the other serious. Now, all this to a girl of eighteen with little experience, rendered comparison useless.

The evening of the ball soon came round. At seven Alice was all ready dressed; and John Morrison looked at her with undisguised admiration, while her mother was—naturally enough—in raptures,—as mothers always are when they gaze on their fair and charming offspring. About half past seven the carriage came. There were Walter and Edward, and the two Misses Clifton, (the mother was indisposed,) ecstacies with Alice. They did not stop long; for all were young and all were eager for the hour when music should invite them to join in the dance,—an amusement—when it leads not too often to late hours—both healthful and conducive to cheerfulness of mind.

John Morrison remained with Mrs. Dempster despite the efforts of the Clifton's to take him with them. For some time nothing was spoken of but the beauty, grace and elegance of Alice; then the conversation turned toward the subject of her marriage with Walter—he having distinctly announced his intention to make a formal demand of her hand on the Saturday, if he obtained the young girls consent that night. John bit his lips; and, to change the conversation, opened a book and read aloud. Mrs. Dempster listened awhile; and then, the stillness and quiet, the silent night asserted its influence and she fell asleep. John continued reading for about half an hour and then laid down his book and fell into a deep reverie. He was half asleep and half awake for hours. Suddenly he started up as the clock struck four, and found Mrs Dempster preparing tea.

"Not home yet," said John, smiling,—"the little dissipated girl."

"It is so seldom she goes out," replied Mrs. Dempster, "I do not expect her home yet"

At this moment the sound of carriage wheels was heard There were two, not one. They threw open the casement. It was daylight; and within a hundred yards they discovered the carriage and a gig side by side. Alice was in the gig driven by Walter, while some friends filled the vacant places in the other vehicle. They came up at the door. Alice leaped out; then, with a bow, and a "good morning," the party sped away homeward. As she entered the room, both noticed that all Alice's elasticity of step,—all her spirits,—all her liveliness, was gone.—Dover Gozette and Staffotd Advocate.

Susceptibility of Animals to Atmospheric Changes.

In the common sensations of life we perceive a distinction, according as the exciting cause is agreeable or otherwise—whether it presents itself as pleasure or dislike, bodily strength or weakness, activity or fatigue, warm or cold—by pressure or tension of the atmosphere, &c. By these combinations of sensations, all animals in which they are strongly enveloped are enabled to anticipate atmospherical changes before the most delicate instruments give any indication of them; and, in a minor degree, the same is traceable in persons of great nervous susceptibility. In the animal world it extends not only to creatures of the land and of the air, but also to those which inhabit the water.

The actiniæ throw out their feelers and expand themselves when a continuance of fine weather is to be expected, but withdraw and contract themselves, even in a room, when a change is impending. The mussels, before the approach of a storm, spin several new threads to secure their hold on the rocks; and leeches rise to the surface of the water before rain. Spiders enlarge their webs during fine weather, but spin only short threads, work seldom, or hide themselves in corners during rain.—Many beetles, by their active flight and humming sounds, give token of the morrow's brightness. Before rain, bees remain either in their hives or in the neighborhood of them, and ants convey deep into their hills the pupæ which they expose to the sun in fine weather.

The leeches rise anxiously to the surface of the water before a storm, and hence in Germany they are called weather-fish; and are kept in glasses where, by their uneasy movements, they denote a change twenty four hours in advance; and, from the same cause, many fish forsake the sea for the rivers; the groundling is roused into activity, the silurus leaves the deep waters, and the eels become lively. If the lightning strikes the water, the perch sickens and dies: the snake and the slow worm are restless before a storm; toads leave their concealment before rain, ducks are busily active, and swallows fly lower.

Before a storm breaks forth, many birds such as the cross-bill and plover, are uneasy, and show themselves less; and while many species of water-fowl hurry for shelter to the shore, the petrel, as if rejoicing in the coming conflict of the elements, dashes forth and defies its power. If the atmosphere be lowering in the morning pigeons feed rapidly, and return to their cots; and the hare hides itself, but the mole comes to the surface of the ground, and the squirrels seek its nest, and shuts its entrance. This susceptibility of atmospherical changes influences, also, materially the natural economy of some animals; the wild rabbit, for instance, which feeds chiefly in the evening or at night, comes forth at noon-day if the weather portends rain, and losses its natural timidity in its eagerness to procure food.

Before the occurrence of an earthquake, animals become uneasy In that which took place in Calabria in 1783 it was noticed by Bartel that the sea-fish were disturbed, and were taken in vast numbers; many birds fluttered about distressed in the air; dogs ran about howling; the horses and oxen trembled, pawing the ground and snorting as if in agony; and the cats stunk about with their hair bristled up.—Thompson's Passions of Animals.

JOSEPHINE AFTER HER DIVORCE.

The next morning at eleven the divorced Empress was to leave the Palace of the Tuileries, to return to it no more. From the highest to the lowest member of the household, all assembled to witness the departure of her, who in the fine language of one of their number, carried with her into exile, the hearts of all who had access to her presence. Leaning on the arm of one of her ladies, and so deeply veiled that her countenance could not be seen, she descended the stairway in silence too profound to last; for she had taken but a few steps before there was an involuntary and simultaneous burst of grief. But she spoke not. The only response she made to this touching language of grief from those who loved her, was the shudder of the last pang she was ever to feel in the imperial halls, where she had embellished the Empire of Napoleon. She sank fainting into a close carriage, and the clatter of the feet of six horses echoed coldly through the courtyard as they bore away from that ancient palace the fairest, the brightest, and the best woman that had ever sat upon the throne of France.

Several months Josephine had now passed in solitude and grief. Whatever Napoleon could do to mitigate the harshness of this severe stroke had been done. A pension of six hundred thousand dollars a year was settled on her for life, and promptly paid till Napoleon's fall. The magnificent villa of Malmaison, with all its grounds and treasures of art and beauty, with the ancient palace of Navarre, were presented to her—and her title of Empress was confirmed. She received frequent visits—"almost of homage"—from the members of the Imperial Court, for it was universally understood that Napoleon desired every token of respect should be shown to his former wife. Her villa presented a more animated and brilliant spectacle than even while Napoleon was its master. It was frequented by the most illustrious statesmen, scholars, artists and men of taste, of the Empire. She was universally respected, admired, and beloved, and her fall from the throne seemed to clothe her with new splendor.

She still cherished her affection for Napoleon, and lost no opportunity of demonstrating her respect for him. The apartment he had occupied remained exactly as he had left it; she would not suffer even a chair to be removed, and indeed very rarely permitted any one to enter, keeping the key herself and dusting the articles with her own hands. On his table was a volume of history, with the page doubled down where he had finished reading; beside it lay a pen, with the ink dried on the point, and a map of the world, on which he was accustomed to point out his plans to those in his confidence, and which still showed on its surface many marks of his impatience. These Josephine would not allow to be touched on any account. By the wall stood Napoleon's camp bed without curtains; and above continued to hang such of his arms as he had placed there. On different pieces of furniture were flung various portions of apparel, just as he had used them last; for, among his other extraordinary ways, he had a practice, on retiring to rest, of flinging rather than taking off his clothes, casting down a coat here, a vest there, usually pitching his watch into the bed, and his hat and shoes into the farthest corner of the apartment.

"Josephine's own bed chamber, to which she removed after the divorce, was extremely simple draped only with white muslin, its sole ornament being the gold toilet service, and which, with a noble generosity, she refused to consider as private property, till Napoleon sent it after her with many other valuables left behind in like manner."

In devoting herself to the adornment of the villa Malmaison, Josephine displayed the most refined and artistic taste. In a letter of instruction to her superintendent, she tells him that the first apartment of the suit, which was to serve for an ante-room, must be painted in light green, with a border of lilacs In the pannels were to be placed fine engravings from Bible scenes, and under each, a portrait of the distinguished Generals of the Revolution. In the centre of the room there was always to be a large flower stand filled with fresh flowers in their season and in each angle the bust of a French philosopher She particularly mentions that Rosseau was to stand between the two windows, where the vines and foliage could play around his head, forming a natural crown worthy of the author of Emile. Her private cabinet was to be in light blue, with a border of ranunculus and polyanthus. Ten large engravings from the gallery of the Muses, and twenty medallions filled up the pannels. The casements were painted white and green with double fillets of gold "Unite elegance to variety, but no study, no profusion. I confide to you the care of rendering this cherished spot an agreeable retreat, where I may meditate—sleep perhaps—but oftenest read; which says sufficient to remind you of the three hundred volumes of my small edition."

The first million of francs which Napoleon allowed Josephine from his own purse, was expended in restoring the castle of the ancient kings of Navarre, which had been long neglected and nearly demolished in the Revolution. Its immense part had once been embellished by flowing streams and gleaming lakes; but the water courses had ceased to flow, and the lakes had become stagnant marshes. But Josephine soon made it wear a new aspect, the beds of the streams were cleared out, and covered with white gravel, the lakes were excavated and filled with fish; the old forest roads were repaired, and fertility and beauty once more embellished this ancient retreat of the French monarchs. In these delightful engagements, she was aided by the tastes of the most distinguished artists in France, and in her public improvements Napoleon himself aided by his ingenious and practical suggestions. Thus, gradually, the heavy cloud which had so long hung in blackness over her heavens, began to break away, and was dissolved by the balmy sunshine; and her palace soon wore the aspect of hospitality, intellectual and artistic refinement.—Napoleon's Dynasty.—By the Berkley Men.

GRAND DEMONSTRATION.

ROBERTS AND BENSON.

Mr. Herald:—You are aware that when the election returns from the leeward counties arrived here, and it was ascertained that J. J. Roberts, and S. A. Benson had received a large majority of votes for President and Vice President of the Republic—the political friends of those gentlemen in this county, determined to celebrate their triumph, in this city, by a public demonstration; and for several days extensive preparations were being made for the accommodation of a large number of persons expected from the interior settlements.

It occurred to me Mr. Herald, that a statement of the proceedings of the day might be gratifying to some of your readers, who had not the satisfaction of witnessing them. If so, the following is at your service.

At the dawn of day, on the morning of the 20th inst., a gun, and another, and another in quick succession from central hill, aroused the yet slumbering members of the administration party, and announced to them that the day on which they had fixed to congratulate the men of their choice, had arrived; and scarcely had old Sol peeped above the eastern horizon, when the roar of cannon—the martial tones of drum and fife—and the joyous faces, here and there, seen, predicted a glorious day:—and so it turned out to be in every respect.

About 9 o'clock A. M. a fleet of boats and canoes—tastefully decorated with flags and pendants—was seen emerging from the Stockton creek into the broad Messurado, and the long and loud trumpet peal, from the headmost barge, brought an immense crowd to the landing. As three boats neared the wharf of General Lewis, where the Monrovia deputation had assembled to receive their guests, they formed in line, and their hearty and deafing cheers, from river and shore, rent the air—and the most extraordinary enthusiasm prevailed. In a short time a procession was formed—the citizens of the several towns and villages arraying themselves under their respective banners, on which were inscribed the names of the candidates, and incidents connected with some of the more prominent events of their public life. Thus formed and headed by a band of music, the procession marched to the residence of President Roberts. I cannot, Mr. Herald, pretend to estimate the number of persons, including many ladies, present, but there were hundreds, I like to have said thousands, already assembled at the President's mansion—who seemed to be animated by one heart and spirit, rendering it a scene of warm greeting and unbounded enthusiasm. In the midst of tremendous cheering, the President and Vice President elect were introduced to the immense concourse, by Messrs Sion Harris and John Jamieson of Caldwell.

Mr. H. W. Erskine of Kentucky, member elect of the House of Representatives, advanced and addressed in turn the President and Vice President elect, in a strain of fervid eloquence, seldom, if ever equalled in Liberia. The speaker eulogised in appropriate language the eminent talents, wisdom and patriotism of President Roberts—spoke of his public services in the Cabinet, and in the field—of his diplomacy at home, and abroad; and assured the President of the unqualified confidence of his fellow citizens in his integrity and ability, and of their approval of his hitherto official conduct in the management of their public affairs; and in the name of his fellow citizens, congratulated him on his re-election to the Presidency—vociferous cheering.

President Roberts returned thanks. He said the sentiments just expressed sunk deep into his soul; and impressed him with feelings of profound gratitude—that the kind and flattering manner in which the speaker had been pleased to allude to him personally, and of his public life, and official conduct, awakened in him feelings which no language could express—this new expression of the confidence of his fellow citizens—their spontaneous cheers and greetings, amply repaid him for every effort of his life to advance the interests of our beloved country. He alluded to some facts connected with the political campaign, just passed, in stirring language—he regretted the feelings that had been manifested on the part of a few of their political opponents, however he did not hold the mass of the anti-administration party accountable for the conduct of individual members of that party—there were those among his personal friends who differed from him in political opinion, and he had no right to doubt but that they were actuated by noble and patriotic feelings, and now that the contest had terminated, he hoped that all rancorous feeling would subside. He again thanked his fellow citizens for the honor they had a fourth time conferred upon him, and assured them, that while entrusted with the management of their public affairs, he should study to deserve the confidence they had reposed in him. His remarks were received with demonstrations of delight.

Mr. Erskine, when the cheering had somewhat subsided—delivered a brief address to the Vice President elect. He assured him of the pleasure his fellow citizens felt in having elected him to the highest honor, but one, in the gift of the people—that he was emphatically a son of Liberia reared in her midst—shared in her greatest difficulties and sufferings—bled in her defence—has always upheld her honor—and labored to advance her true interests. "You sir, your fellow citizens delight to honor; and in their names, I this day congratulate you."

Judge Benson responded in his happiest style. He spoke of the days of his early life in Liberia—of his constant and untiring devotion and exertion to advance her interests—of the gratification he felt at meeting so many of his political friends—and of his sense of the honor they had conferred upon him. He assured his fellow citizens that their confidence in him should never be shaken—and henceforth every power of his mind should be brought into requisition to promote the interests of his fellow citizens—great cheering.

The President and Vice President elect, retired from the dense crowd, amidst cheers and huzzas, which seemed almost to shake the very earth beneath them. The sound of drum and fife heightened the excitement and added to the vivacity of the scene. These proceedings ended with the discharge of cannon from central hill, and the parade ground.

In the shade of the orange trees, opposite the residence of David Moore, Esq: was spread a table loaded with the good things of life—and at 1 o'clock, about three hundred gentlemen sat down to discuss—not politics—a luncheon served up in handsome style by the Committee of arrangements.—Mrs. Roberts entertained perhaps, as many ladies at the President's dwelling.

After the refreshments, the President and Vice President elect were placed in a carriage, handsomely ornamented for the occasion—and drawn down broad street to street, thence up Ashmun street to the President,s mansion, followed by the largest political concourse ever assembled in Liberia.

The President elect, in a most patriotic speech again addressed the crowed amidst vociferous cheers and rounds of applause. He thanked his fellow citizens for their kind appreciation of his services, as manifested in the present demonstration which could not be misunderstood—and which testified to him that they were satisfied that during the six years of his administration he had administered their affairs to the best of his ability—he had hoped when his present term of office should have expired he might withdraw from public life; but his fellow citizens demanded his services for another term, and he felt that he could not resist a wish so generally expressed. or disregard a demand so earnestly expressed—he loved Liberia, her interests were dear to him and laid nearest his heart—and he could but sacrifice himself and his personal interests to her welfare—great applause.

Something was said during your late canvass about endangering our republican institutions by the example of a re-election for a fourth term to the Presidency. Don't believe it fellow citizens (no, no, cheers.) republican principles are too deeply rooted in the hearts of the people of Liberia, they understand them and will never give way their own liberties—the people of iberia will ever retain the power of withdrawing authority as well as giving it: with respect to himself, his principles were too well known, he would lay down his life, if necessary, in defence of our free republican institutions—great cheering. He thanked his fellow citizens for the readiness with which they had always supported him in the execution of the laws, and in the discharge of his official duties—that this support would be continued he entertained no doubts. Again thanking his fellow citizens for their expressions of confidence, he withdrew while the air resounded with thundering cries of hurrahs. This Mr. Herald, is but an imperfect outline of the President's speech, such was the excitement of the occasion as to render at impossible for even a perfect stenographer to render a complete sketch.

Thus ended the ceremony for the present, and with the exception of the martial music heard in every part of the city all was quiet till about 7 in the evening when a large crowed again assembled at the Govt: House to witness a magnificent display of fire works, which went off in grand style, during which patriotic peices composed for the occasion, were sung, with great enthusiasm

I forgot to say that on one of the banners, prepared we believe, by some of the ladies, were inscribed the words "We are happy without a change."

It is worthy of remark, that among such a concourse of people, there was no disturbance of the public peace, nor was there a person seen under the influence of liquor.

Thus did the people honor the men of their choice. The day was remarkably propitious and eminently adapted to such a demonstration—the atmosphere being unusually clear, serene, and lovely. We beleive that a more happy selection for the office of Vice President could not have been made in Liberia. Mr Benson's talents; and experience in Government affairs, his extensive knowledge of Liberia—and his devoted attachment to her interests, qualify him in a high degree for the office. We respectfully tender our best wishes to the President and Vice President elect, praying that the Sovereign ruler of nations—may vouchsafe unto them "wisdom profitable to direct and administer the Government.

OBSERVER

Monrovia, May 23rd, 1853.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, MAY 23rd, 1853.

At the solicitation of many of our readers, our paper has been delayed, to give notice of the celebration of the election—and of the congratulations which were showered upon President Roberts on his fourth re-election to the Presidency,—and of the warm and hearty greetings extended to Judge Benson of Grand Bassa, on his election to the Vice Presidency—together with the rejoicings of the entire Administration party, for the success which crowned their efforts in electing all of their ticket. Our correspondent "Observer," as he admits, has given but a sketch of the scene presented in this City, on Friday the 20th.—indeed from all we saw and heard, he has acquitted himself well—In none of the particulars has he said more than he should,—he has certainly shown himself an impartial painter. It would be impossible to give a more concise sketch of the doings of that day.

Death of the ex-Secretary of State.—It is seldom that we are called upon to notice the death of a citizen who has attracted as much notice and distinguished himself so eminently as the gentleman, whose death we are now called upon to record. The Hon. Hilary Teage, extensively known as one of the most intelligent of the citizens of our Republic, died on the evening of the 21st inst., after a few days illness. Mr. Teage as a statesman occupied a prominent position in the Republic—his well known talents and ability, claimed for him the admiration of the people of Liberia—and in foreign lands, he was highly respected, and spoken of as being gifted with extraordinary powers of intellect. As a citizen of Liberia, his loss will be seriously felt, and in this connection, we call upon the young men of Liberia to strive to attain that high prominence which the deceased obtained, by close attention to study, and the application of their minds to the wants of Liberia, and to the duties which they owe to their country and fellow citizens.

It is hoped, that very shortly we will receive an obituary notice of this distinguished citizen of our Republic.

It is now well known, that Prince George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, has no intention of visiting Monrovia, and that he will not take any steps to ameliorate the condition of Boombo who is now a prisoner here, for acts of rebellion perpetrated under his direction. Can no steps be taken to bring Cain to understand in some other way, than that of beseeching what is his duty under the circumstances?

In our last, we noticed the attention given to the cultivation of sugar cane on the St. Paul's, and of the manufacture of sugar and syrup—but in mentioning the names of these who were reported to be most largely engaged in the business, we left out the name of Mr. Outland. It is said that this gentleman far exceeds all others in the quality of sugar manufactured, on his place.

The excitement consequent upon the election, has subsided. We say subsided, from the fact, that the industrious and enterprising citizens have classed the election of the 3rd of May, among the things "that were." We do not wish to be miss understood, and we intend not to be. That there are a few partizans who hoped to gain some loaves & fishes from the result of the election, and thereby avoid the fulfilment of the purposes for which they were created—"to live by the sweat of their brow." and who, tho' signally defeated, still agitate and employ, to say the least of them, means, which honorable minds would shrink from even entertaining, cannot be doubted. We have an advice to give to those men, and we give it as friends. If they will hearken to us, they will be gainers in the end. Our object is to try to bring them into honest notoriety—to make them industrious and valuable citizens of our young Republic—to make them respectable among every class of people in our State. Let them follow the example of their neighbors of their own party too—WORK!—"DEE!" it is an honorable employment. Long before they came to this country, Liberia existed—the affairs of government were carried on without their council or assistance.—The Government was firmly established and administerted to the satisfaction of the people. Now every thing is wrong—the constitution and laws under which the people have for years lived, in the enjoyment of liberty and happiness, are attempted to be tortured to suit the views of a few restless characters. who hope to live, by going about discussing politics. Whatever may be gained by this kind of employment in other countries. we full well know that nothing honorable nor praiseworthy can be obtained here by it: and our advice is to every one—go work.

Our Trade—Though the rainy season has fully set in, there is but little abatement in our trade. It was anticipated that in the present season, but a very limited quantity of palm oil would be obtained—the contrary we are most happy to say, is the fact. Indeed from all parts of the Republic, the most encouraging reports of trade are received, and there is not much probability of any abatement in it till the middle of the rainy season. The cry from every quarter is, the want of goods and the vessel which comes along first with a good assortment will be fortunate. She will meet with ready sales and immediate payment.

The Bark "Elphinstone" of London, according to late advices, was about to leave Demarara for the coast, with about two hundred and fifty Kroomen, who went there some five years ago to labour. They found immediate employment at fair prices. and are now returning to their homes well supplied with most every description of articles; and bringing with them large quantities of money. They will also be enabled, from the information which they obtained in the growing of sugar cane, and in its manufacture, to give much valuable information to the sugar cane growers in Liberia.

The Immigrants located on the banks of the beautiful St: Paul's are geting on well. It is said that with very few exceptions, nearly all of them have passed safely through their acclimation

The Constitution. The opinion is now being pretty generally entertained, that the Constitution of the Republic ought to be amended! Many persons hitherto have strongly opposed any alteration in that instrument, but now it is very obvious and it will, we think tend greatly to the future stability of the State, that some provision should be made to it, in reference to electoral qualifications.

We have received late advices from the leeward counties,—there was nothing to disturb the harmony and good will of the people. The surrounding natives, are on the best terms with, our people, and continue to cultivate their friendship. A spirit of industry is abroad in the land, and we hope sufficient inducements will be found to keep it constantly afloat. At one time every person who was so fortunate as to be the owner of a hundred dollars, embarked it in trafficking with the natives, and within, six month's time, his all was gone. In this respect things have changed decidedly for the better. The trading business now is mostly in the hands of men of experience, and most of the petty traders have turned their attention to the cultivation of the soil.

About the middle of this month the Administration party at Sinoe, had an extensive, and very costly we are told demonstration in honor of the victory achieved in the re-election of President Roberts, and the election of Judge Benson to the Vice Presidency—it is said that the natives rejoiced at the result of the election with as much enthusiasm, as did our people. We know such was the case among the natives in this county.

We also learn that Grand Bassa,—ever true to her allegiance, will or, have made suitable demonstrations in honor of the victory. It is hoped that our friends in the sister counties, will furnish for our paper their doings. It will be gratifying to the friends here.

According to the official returns of the votes Polled throughout the State,—Sinoe excepted, as no Registers of votes polled at the several towns and villages in that County have been received at the State Department—(but public rumor says—that J M. Priest is elected Senator for that County. and S V. Mitchel, Representative for the same). the following named persons are elected.

Joseph J. Roberts. President.
Stephen A Benson. Vice President.
A. F Russell. Senator for Monsterrado County.
Charles Henry, do. " Grand Bassa County.
B. V. R. James, Sion Harris, Henry W. Dennis, H W Erskine. } Representatives for Monserrado County.
M. A. Rand, W W. Davis, G. L. Seymore. } Representatives for Grand Bassa County.

POETRY

THE BLIND MAN'S BRIDE

When first beloved in vanished hours
The blind man sought thy love to gain,
They said thy cheek was bright as flowers
New freshen'd by the summer rain:
They said thy movements, swift yet soft,
Were such as make the winged dove
Seem as it gently soars aloft,
The image of repose and love.

They told me too, an eagar crowd
Of wooers praised thy beauty rare,
But that thy heart was all too proud
A common love to meet or share.
Ah! thine was neither pride nor scorn,
But in thy coy and virgin breast
Dwelt preference not of passion born,
The love that hath a holier rest!

Days came and went.—Thy step I heard
Passed frequent, as it passed me by;—
Days came and went:—thy heart was stirred
And answered to my stifled sigh!
And thou didst make a humble choice,
Content to be the blind man's bride;
Who loved thee for thy gentle voice,
And owned no joy on earth beside.

And well by that sweet voice I knew
(Without the happiness of light)
Thy years, as yet, were glad and few,
Thy smile most innocently bright;
I knew now full of love's own grace
The beauty of thy form must be;
And fancy idolized the face;
Whose loveliness I might not see!

Oh! happy were those days, Beloved!
I almost ceased for light to pine
When through the summer vaels we roved,
Thy fond hand gently linked in mine.
Thy soft 'Good night' still sweetly cheered
The unbroken darkness of my doom;
And thy 'Good morrow, love,' endured
The sunrise which returned in gloom!

At length, as years rolled swiftly on,
They spoke to me of Times decay—
Of roses from thy smooth cheek gone,
And ebon ringlets turned to grey.
Ah! then I blest the sightless eyes
Which could not feel the deepening shade,
Nor watch beneath succeeding skies
Thy withering beauty faintly fade.

I saw no paleness on thy brow,
No lines upon thy forhead smooth—
But still the BLIND MAN heard thee speak,
In accents made to bless and soothe,
Still he could feel thy guiding hand
As through the woodlands wild we ranged.—
Still in the summer light could stand,
And know thy HEART and VOICE unchanged

And still, beloved, till life grows cold,
We'll wander 'neath a genial sky,
And only know that we are old
By counting happy years gone by;
For thou to me art still as fair
As when those happy years began —
When first thou cam'st to sooth and share
The sorrows of a sightless man!

Old time, who changes all below,
To wean men gently for the grave,
Hath brought us no increase of woe,
And leaves us all he ever gave;
For I am still a helpless thing,
Whose darkened world is cheered by thee—
And thou art she whose beauty's Spring
The blind man vainly yearned to see;

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

Its Position and Prospects.

Cotinued.

Here lies the secret of Turkey continuance, and she will never cease to be until these different powers make up their minds to go again into fierce contests with one another, or agree upon some amicable rule for the partition of this territory among themselves. I have often thought that the kingdom of the Sultan might be compared to an old cask whose hoops had all rotted off, and which was preserved in the shape of a cask only by several persons standing around and clasping it in their arms This service the Sovereigns of Europe are now performing for Turkey, but let one of them step aside, and the old cask will soon drop to pieces.

As might be expected, each government aims to keep a practised diplomatist here as its representative, and it is amusing to see the [illegible] is continually going on among them [illegible] ascendency The great point is to have the ear of the leading Ministers of State, and to manage them to suit particular views. There are the Grand Vizir and the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Minister of War, and the Grand Admiral, and the members of the great imperial council. As in other countries changes among these different officers are not unfrequent, and one will naturally be partial to England, another to Russia, and another to France; and it is not unusual to hear it said, the present administration is English, or it is French, or it is Russian, as the case may be? If external or internal war threatens Turkey, there is the utmost profusion of aid offered from all quarters. England and France are ready with their fleets, and Russia with her fleet and army; and looking on the mere outward appearance, you would really think that no country in the world was so blessed with powerful and ready friends and allies as this. But a closer inspection would lead you to doubt the perfect sincerity and disinterestedness of these friends. This, however, I must say, that if policy leads England to show friendliness to Turkey, it also, at the same time, leads her to seek for the best good of the people here. England's influence has ever been on the side of free institutions, popular education, and just laws. In her strifes with the other powers, however, for the ascendant influence in this country, she has always labored under one disadvantage. In the native Greek population of Turkey, Russia has always had a large and influential body in perfect sympathy with her; and the French have had a similar if not an equally strong advantage in the native Catholics; while no body of men existed here, who were bound by any religious ties to England. A native protestant community has been organized, and if it grows, as seems now probable, this want will by and by be supplied.

The great Eastern question is still to be solved, and I am not yet ready to give you any prospective dicta, or even guesses on the subject. In the meantime, the descent of the country and government is rapid, towards the lowest poverty. How can it be otherwise? Thousands and millions of money are going abroad every year to purchase goods, military and naval stores, equipments, or machinery to make them, and little indeed is coming back in return, for their exports are few.—Bicknell's Reporter

LOOK WHERE STEPHEN LOOKED.

When believing souls, says the pious McCheyne, seek for peace and joy in believing, they do very generally confine their view to Christ upon the earth. They remember him as the Good Shepherd seeking the lost sheep; they look to him sitting by the well of Samaria; they remember him saying to the sick of the palsy, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee;" but they too seldom think of looking where Stephen looked, to where Jesus is now, at the right hand of God. "If you would be whole Christians, you must look to a whole Christ; you must lift your eye from the cross to the throne, and you will find him the same Saviour in all, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever."

It is because he is at the right hand of God that he is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by him. How triumphantly does Paul present this glorious truth, as securing the salvation of all believers! "Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather, that is risen again, who is ever at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Bright, indeed, are the future prospects of the true believer, however weak in himself, and however unworthy. Well may we rejoice to say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."—The Presbyterian.

DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The following condensed record of the life of the Duke of Wellington, we find in the New York Times. We have not seen elsewhere so complete a sketch in so brief a compass:

The Duke of Wellington, whose death is announced by the Canada's news, was the fourth son of the second Earl of Mornington, and was born at Dongan Castle in the county of Meath, Ireland, May 1, 1769. He was educated at Eton, and thence proceeded to the Military college of Angiers, France, then directed by Pinnerol. When in his eighteenth year, Arthur Wesley, for such was the form of his name which he first adopted, was gazetted to an Ensigney in the 73d Regiment, and on the following Christmas day, was promoted to a Lieutenancy in the 76th. Other military changes and promotions took place, until, in 1790, he was returned to Parliament from the borough of Trim, in the county of Meath. On the 30th April, 1793, Captain Wellesley was gazetted Major of the 33d Foot, and on the 30th of the following September, he succeeded to the Lieutenant-Colonelcy of that regiment In the following year, the 33d received orders to join the Earl of Moira's expedition to the French coast, but these orders were revoked, and the regiment sailed for Ostend to reinforce the Duke of York; arriving in the Lower Countries, however, only in season to cover the retreat of the Duke's army. In 1795, Colonel Wellesley, embarked with his regiment for the West Indies, but was driven back by winds. In the following April, the regiment sailed for the East Indies, and Wellesley joined it at the Cape in May. His brother, the Marquis Wellesley, was soon afterwards appointed Governor-General of India, and opportunities of distinguishing himself were not long wanting to Colonel Wellesley. The Indian career of the future hero began with the attack upon Tippo sultan at the Mysore Capital. On the 12th December, 1803, Gen. Wellesley laid siege to the important Indian fortress of Gawilghur, and by its capture terminated a brilliant series of victories. On March 9th, 1805, the General resigned his command and returned to England. He was complimented by an Order in Council of the Governor-General and the Court of East Indian Directors, and a sword was presented to him by the inhabitants of Calcutta, where, as indeed, throughout the British possessions in India, the most unbounded joy was caused by the manner in which the war had been terminated. The thanks of Parliament were also given to the Governor-General and to the commanders, officers and soldiers who had served in the campaign. Wellesley was created an extra Knight Companion of the Bath, his investure being directed by the King to take place without waiting for a vacancy. Many addresses were presented to him by various public bodies in India, and a splendid gold vase, valued at 2,000 guineas, was given to him, with a flattering address, by the officers of his division of the Indian army Sir Arthur embarked for England on March 10th. On his arrival in England, he was appointed to the command of the troops at Hastings. On April 9th, 1806 he married Catherine, third daughter of the second Earl of Longford.—Shortly after his return to England, he was ordered to join the Earl of Cathcart and General Don, who were proceeding with a British force to effect a junction with the allied Austrian and Russian armies in what they hoped was to be a march to Paris. The forces were not brought into service, and Sir Arthur returned home Shortly afterward, he took his seat in the House of Commons as member for Newport, Hampshire, and was for sometime engaged in an unpleasant contest with a Mr. Paull, who had lately returned to England, and come forward in Parliament as the accuser of the Marquis of Wellesley and his brother. On April 3d, 1807, he accepted the Irish Secretaryship, an office which he discharged in the spirit of a conquering soldier. In taking office, Sir Arthur had stipulated that his Ministerial duties should not interfere with his professional; and, accordingly, in the summer of 1807, he was once more employed on active service, and arrived at Corunna, in Spain, on the 20th July, 1808, whence he left for the Tagus, and was there joined by Gen. Spencer, their united forces amounting to 20,000 men The war in the peninsula is historical. The battle of Talavera, and the passage of the Douro, procured for Sir Arthur the title of Baron Doura and Viscount Wellington, with a vote of thanks from Parliament, and a pension of £2,000 a year. The winter of 1809, '10 was spent in forming plans for the defence of Portugal against an overwhelming force. Lord Wellington discerned a mode in which the object could be attained, and he planned the celebrated lines of Torres Vedras. The French, under King Joseph and Soult, having re-conquered Andalusia, Massena advanced, in the spring of 1810, to drive the British out of Portugal. His force amounted to 50,000 men, to whom Wellington could oppose 60,000. Wellington slowly retired, halting only once, at Busaco, to give battle to the unsuspecting enemy, and on the 10th, entered the lines of Torres Vedras. Massena halted when he descried the bulwark which the English had raised, and, having been led into a desolate country, where he was unable to provide provisions for his army, retreated, unmolested by Wellington, who kept to his entrenchments, notwithstanding he had been reinforced by sea to 89,000 men. In 1811, Wellington received the thanks of the Crown and Parliament, for having driven the French out of Portugal In the same year, the terrible battles of Fuentes d'Onor and Albuera was fought, when Wellington was victorious. Massena was recalled; and Marmont placed in his stead Marmont, with an army of 60,000 men, forced Wellington to raise the siege of Badajoz, and retreated into Portugal. In 1812, while the French were in winter quarters, Wellington managed to take Ciudad Rodrigo, garrisoned with 1,700 men, and Badajoz garrisoned with 4,000 men. In the beginning of July, the opposing armies again approached each other on the Tormes, near Salamanca, where the battle named from the last place was fought, resulting in the total discomfiture of the French. The French army was obliged to retreat, having lost between 8,000 and 9,000 men in slain, wounded and prisoners. On the 12th August following, 1813, the British general made his triumphal entry into Madrid, and was immediately appointed Generalissimo of the Spanish armies. On the 8th, of the same month, he was created Marquis of Wellington, by the Prince-Regent. On November 3d, the French armies of the South and Centre united, and the next day re-entered Madrid. The British government, encouraged by the disasters of Napoleon in Russia, sent over re-inforcement after re-inforcement; and and when Lord Wellington recommended active operations, he was the commander of 200,000 men—the finest force ever directed by an English general. The great cause of Wellington's success in Spain was, that he had the sea open to him, by which means his army was always provisioned, while the French army could never keep in position for more than a few days, relying upon the country for support which was soon exhausted. Had Marmont been able to find supplies for his army, Wellington would never have been able to leave the position in which he had blockaded him. Wellington was named Embassador to the Court of France, and reached Paris, May 4th. From Paris he proceeded to Madrid, which he reached on May 24th, and from which he furnished an able and lucid memorandum of the State of Spain On the 10th, the Duke of Wellington repaired to the army of Bordeaux, and superintended the arrangements for the embarkation of those portions of the army recalled from the Continent. It was part of this army, under Pakenham, that was so shockingly beaten at New Orleans.

On the 28th of June, the Duke took his seat in the House of Lords, for the first time. On May 10th, the Prince-Regent had sent to the House a message, recommending them to grant the Duke such an annuity as might support the high dignity of the title conferred, and prove a lasting memorial of the nation's gratitude and munificence. On the 12th, the speaker moved that the sum of £10,000 be annually paid out of the consolidated fund for the use of the Duke of Wellington, to be at any time computed for the sum of £300,000, to be laid out in the purchase of an estate At the suggestion of Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Ponsonby, and Mr. Canning, the proposed sum was unanimously increased to £100,000, making in all half a million sterling. Suitable pensions were also granted to the Duke's newly pensioned Lieutenants On July 1st, he personally thanked the Commons for their bounty. On the 30th, the peace of Paris was concluded.

Wellington was at Vienna when the return of Napoleon from Elba called him to Belgium to take the command of the Anglo-Batavian army. After the drawn battle of Quatre-Bras, on June 16, between the Anglo-Batavian and a part of the French army, under Ney, Wellington learning the defeat of Blucher, at Ligny, retreated on Brussels, and on the evening of the 17th, took a position in front of the village of Mount St. Jean. Paris capitulated to Wellington and Blucher on July 3d, 1815. The English Field Marshal was appointed to command the allied army of observation; and, on the final evacuation of France Nov. 1st, 1818, he returned to England. Another £200,000 was granted by Parliament in 1815. The remainder of his career belongs to civil history. On his return to England, he entered Lord Liverpool's Cabinet as Master-General of the Ordnance In 1826, he went to St. Petersburg, on a special Embassy. In 1827, the Duke was busily engaged in Parliament, the principal subject which occupied his attention being the granting of aid to the King of Portugal against Spanish aggressions, to assist in opposing which a force of 5,000 men was sent over. He was also appointed, with Sir Robert Peel, and other leading members of Parliament, one of the Commissioners of Indian affairs The Duke of York dying on January 5th, the Duke of Wellington was appointed, on the 24th, his successor as Commander-in-Chief, and Colonel of the First Grenadier Guards On March 10th, he was installed in the Office of High Constable of the Tower, with a salary of £1,000 per annum. At the same time, he was appointed custos rotulorum of the Tower Hemlets, with a much greater salary. Lord Liverpool having died on Feb 17th, the King, on April 10th, nominated Mr. Canning as his successor. Upon this, the Duke of Wellington and six others of the principal members of the old Cabinet retired. He resigned the command of the army on the 30th. Lord Goderich soon resigned office, and the Duke of Wellington was instructed to frame a Cabinet. The passing of the reform bill may be said to have formed the termination of his active political life, although his name is more or less heard in every political crisis.—Watchman & Reflector.

REMARKABLE PROVIDENCE

A few days before Christmas, in the year 1840, a Russian clergyman was going home from a place at some distance from the village where he lived. Evening was coming on, and it was growing so bitterly cold that it was almost dangerous for any one to be out. He was wrapped in a fur cloak, and traveled in a sledge, which went fast over the hard, smooth snow. As he went along he saw something lying on the ground, and stooped to see what it was. He found that it was a soldier, who seemed to have fallen down exhausted with the cold, and to all appearance was dead.—The good clergyman, however, would not leave him on the road, but lifted him into the sledge, with his gun, which lay beside him, and drove as fast as he could to the next inn, which it took about half an hour to reach. He was not satisfied with leaving the poor soldier in the care of the people there, but, although he was very anxious to reach his home, he stayed for an hour directing and helping them to do all that was possible in order to bring the man to conscious life again, in case he was not really dead. And at length their endeavors were successful, and his senses and the use of his limbs gradually returned. Then the clergyman set of homewards, having first rewarded the people of the inn, and also given them money to pay for a good meal for the poor man, before he should go forward on his journey. As soon as the man was refreshed and felt able to go, he insisted upon doing so, although the people did all they could to persuade him not to venture out again that night

But he said that he was carrying letters which were important and he must not delay any longer than was quite necessary. So, taking his gun he proceeded on his way, which he found would very soon bring him to the village where the clergyman lived to whom he owed his life. He reached the place before long, and though it was now very late at night, he could not forbear going to the clergyman's house, that he might, if possible, see and thank him for what he had done

As he went up to the house, he saw that, though it was late, there was still a light in it, and as he came nearer, heard loud voices and great confusion within. He hastened to the door, but it was fastened, and without waiting to knock, he ran to the window close by, and looking in, saw the clergyman surrounded by four armed robbers! They had just tied his hands and feet, and were threatening to murder him if he would not tell where his money was to be found. The soldier instantly forced his way in, fired his gun at one of the robbers, and killed him on the spot. The others attacked the soldier, but he disabled one with his bayonet, and the other two were then seized with fear rushed out of the house, leaving the clergyman, as may be supposed, overpowered by astonishment and gratitude for his sudden deliverance. And then his still deeper and happier feelings may be imagined when he found that the poor man, whose life he had saved only a few hours before, had now been made the means of preserving his own.—Episcopal Recorder.

A SPEAKING MACHINE.

Those instructive travelers in Tartary and Thibet, Messrs. Hue and Gabet, relate that in one of the countries they visited it is the custom for those who can afford it to set up praying machines along the rivers. These machines extend their arms to Heaven covered with devotional petitions, which are ceaselessly changed as now one arm and now another is brought uppermost by the flow of the current which keeps the apparatus in action. Thus the busy citizen may take care of his soul and pursue business or pleasure at the same moment, without any danger of his temporal interests causing him to neglect his eternal welfare.

A similar contrivance has been found out by the representatives of the people at Washington. Moved by an equal desire to attend to several things at once, they invented a talking machine which relieves them from that duty, in order that their precious time may, as far as possible, be saved for more agreeable functions. This machine is known as The Congressional Globe and the current that keeps it in motion flows directly from the Treasury of this great and glorious republic The amount of vicarious talk of which it is capable, is quite astonishing, and it has been made to answer quite as well as though every word had actually been uttered by the Honorable members in whose behalf the machine was set agoing.

It seems, however, that the machine may do too much. The other day Hon. Mr. Smart, of Maine, had it make a speech of some three columns of a very impassioned and truculent character This led to complaint. The discourse was too long and too smart. Only easy and sleepy speeches, needing no reply, could be tolerated unless really spoken on the floor of the House, and accordingly a resolution was passed on Wednesday curtailing the usefulness of The Congressional Globe very sensibly. Hereafter no member can fill its columns with a supposititious speech for Buncombe without the express consent of the House. Still gentlemen are to be allowed to correct and tinker ad libitum the speeches they very often make, will often amount to the same thing. And when they satisfy the House that there is nothing in their orations, they will be allowed to turn them over to The Globe just as before. This saves time and money, they say, and imposes on the people, just as the praying machine helps the Asiatic in his pious efforts to humbug Heaven.

—It is no new discovery that the whole system of reporting Congressional debates at Washington is exceedingly slow and shuffless. The Republic alone deserves the credit of independence in the matter, and of reporting what is actually said without first changing it to please the speaker; but it is not able to give the discussions at sufficient length. The other papers regularly send their reports to members for correction, and it frequently happens that some ass of a Senator or Representative has his speech entirely made over before it is given to the public, so that not a word that he really said appears in print. Moreover the debates are often held back for days when they should always appear promptly and in full the next morning. The great London journals do not have their reports corrected by members of Parliaments, nor do they ever put off till next week the publication of yesterday's proceedings, and yet the sessions end after midnight, while Congress is done before dinner. But their example can't be followed at Washington, and so let us be thankful to Mr. Smart for affording the occasion to put a slight check upon one abuse connected with the great process of Congressional slang-whanging.—The New York Tribune.

SELECT TALES.

The Maiden's Choice

A tale of Filial Affection.

Concluded.

"You are tired, love," said her mother, kindly; "here is a nice cup of tea; you look serious. I suppose Master Walter has been proposing to you. I suppose, too, I shall have him here on Saturday, as he threatened, and I shall loose my child next. Never look so serious. It is quite natural; and I do not say it by way of reproach

"Mamma," replied Alice, gravely, "I have had two offers this week—one on Monday last, and one this morning. You look surprised, Mamma; and you, my dear friend, look vexed. I should be sorry if the conclusion of my words should pain you.

On Monday, I accidentally discovered that John Morrison here had loved me as his future wife for six years—"

"John!" exclaimed the mother, looking at them both with an air of unmixed astonishment.

"Yes for six years; and I scorned his love. I thought him too old, too grave for me; and I owned my affection for Walter. This morning Mr. Clifton made me an offer of his hand and heart, and I rejected him."

"Rejected him", cried both in amazement.

"I rejected him" replied Alice gravely; and, dear mother, and dear John, if you both will consent, I wish from this day to be considered the future wife of John Morrison

"Alice, why is this?" exclaimed Mrs. Dempster, who was naturally at first in favor of the rich husband."

"Why is this?" replied Alice, earnestly; because John is generous and good, and Walter is selfish; because John loves you, and Walter treats you as an incumberance and a bore. I declare to you, mother, dear, that I now love John as much more than I did Walter, as I love you more than a stranger

"But speak Alice, dear," cried the enraptured young man "explain this."

"It is our mother who shall judge," replied Alice; "I will ecord two conversations now clearly fixed on my memory, word by word, but only one of which I shall recollect after this morning."

She then related, word for word, what had passed between her and John, and afterwards the scene between her and Walter in the gig.

"I have begged you to ride alone with me," said Clifton, warmly, "that I may pour out my feelings to you. I love you dearest, with all my heart and soul; I wish you to share my fortunes; to be my wife at once—immediately. My friends have already consented; your mother has hinted her gladness to acquiesce; we wait your consent."

"Walter replied Alice, with downcast eyes, "before you go any further. I have something to say to you which may change your sentiments. I have a mother who is alone in the world; she has no body to love or nurse her; as long as she lives, I can never leave her. She has for many years, been my devoted nurse; wherever I go there must she be."

"Oh! but this is nonsense, Alice," cried Walter, impatiently; I have enough of old people at home. I mean to travel for a year or two in France, in Italy, and to return only when I come into my property.

"Then, Walter Clifton," said Alice raising her head, and speaking firmly, "I can never be your wife; you must seek one differently situated to myself. No! Mr. Clifton, I would not leave my mother for one I had loved for years, much more for one I have but known a month.

"But every one parts from their parents when they marry," said Walter pettishly; "you must be mad; on one hand, a young, and fond, and rich husband; all the pleasures of a continental life,—of Paris, of Italy; on the other, a dull home, alongside and old ailing woman, with the prospect of being the wife of a sprig of a clerk, perhaps, like John Morrison."

"Enough, Mr. Clifton," replied Alice, firmly, and almost an[illegible]; if now you were to consent a thousand times to ask, I would not be your wife."

"You never loved me," said Walter, whose anger was almost roused to frenzy.

"I never did; I was dazzled for a while because I knew you not. I saw you handsome and agreeable, and seemingly generous,—I find you [illegible] ungenerous. But pardon me. Such observations come with very ill grace from me. [illegible] still be friends."

"Friends!" laughed Walter fiercely; not I; idiot that I was to believe in woman's love—in a girl's I mean,—not a woman's—who has not yet got over her mammy sickness.

"You forget yourself, Mr. Clifton," said Alice with a smile of pity.

"An[illegible]" asked soc after she had repeated both conversations with scrupulous fidelity, "do you approve the choice I have made between my two suitors?"

"Heartily, my dear girl," replied Mrs. Dempster, taking their two hands. "You are worthy of each other."

Happy John Morrison! Happy Alice! The bells are ringing, if not human bells, those rung by angels at so bright a union, which truly must have been made in Heaven. And then, John Morrison got promoted a week after, and the wedding took place amid pleasant and joyous smiles and all three went to Paris to spend the honeymoon; and there they are now—strange to say—and there I learned their story. Before the first month of their marriage John came into some property worth about five hundred a year. Paris seemed to suit Mrs. Dempster, and it was agreed to stay there. The cottage was let, and a similar one hired for the summer, near the wood of Bologne. Here now dwell Mrs. Dempster, and her two children. The young couple are very happy; they love each other with earnest affection, and, unlike Clifton,—who has married an heiress whom he neglects—have never found their happiness in any way marred by the presence of their mother in their quiet home.—Gazette and Strafford Advertiser.

A FRAGMENT

A short time since two gentlemen were seated in a handsomely furnished parlor. They were busily engaged in conversation, and although very different in dress and demeanor, yet the many allusions to past scenes in which both had been actors, and the unfeigned interest which each betrayed in the welfare of the other, would have plainly told even the most indifferent listener, that the two had been early and intimate friends. This was in truth the case. Both were natives of the same New England village, and in boyhood had been almost inseparable companions. They entered college together, were laughed at by a merry young student as "The second edition of Damon and Pythias," and when college life was over, they separated with much reluctance; the one to engage in mercantile life, the other to study theology, preparatory to his entrance upon the gospel ministry. Nearly twenty years had elapsed since the separation, and in that time the friends had seldom met. The one had become a flourishing merchant in one of our largest cities, the other was settled as pastor over a small church in a country village, many miles distant from the merchant's residence.

In the course of conversation, some incidental allusion was made by the clergyman to an article in a late number of the Watchman and Reflector. The merchant had not seen the article. He did not take the paper.

"Not take the paper, P—?" exclaimed his plainspoken friend. "Why, what objection have you to it?"

"None in the world, my dear S. But I have very little time for reading, and many uses for money."

"Then you don't take any religious newspaper."

"I do not."

"Well, I confess I am surprised. When we left college you were as strong a Baptist as Roger Williams, and you often accused me of lukewarmness in the cause. Now, your interest is so much abated that you do not take even a single denominational paper."

"O, I am just as strong a Baptist as ever. I attend church constantly, and pay my proportion of the taxes."

"But give no support of any of the periodicals, and of course, know nothing of the history or present resources and wants of the denomination, except what you may sometimes glean from occasional conversation. Now, this is certainly a failure of your duty as a Baptist. But there is a stronger light in which you should view this omission. You are a professing Christian, and as such bound, so far as your pecuniary means will allow, to patronize such periodicals as help to promote the cause of your Lord."

"Well, well, S.," said the merchant, evidently a little ruffled, "don't preach any more about it. You are not in the pulpit now."

"Excuse my earnestness, P—; but for your own sake, as well as for the sake of our common Master's cause, I want you to think seriously of the subject."

"And I surely will, as you have it so much at heart."—True Union.

For the Liberia Herald.

"Go Work."

Mr Herald!

In the last number of your paper, I noticed the above simple, but comprehensive advice which you tender to those persons who still continue to agitate, and employ means to keep alive, the excitement of the election, which was just passed, and which, as you very properly remarked, "the industrious and enterprising citizens have classed among the things that were."

It is indeed a matter of regret, that there should be any in our little community, who are disposed, by resorting to improper means, to mar the public peace,—promote sectional divisions &c.—We are a small people—but a handful at best, and nothing will tend so speedily to the destruction of our national existence, as faction, strife &c. Therefore, as these things are seen to proceed from certain men who have no permanent occupation, and as the idle man's head is the devil's workshop. "I think that such would, do infinitely better for themselves—for the community and for Liberia, if, heeding your advice, they would go to work.

But it is my impression, Mr. Herald, (if you will indulge me with a few more remarks) that the man who left his native land and came to Liberia—with a view, to build up a home for himself and for his posterity; to erect an asylum where his brethren that may come after him shall find a refuge from social and political oppression; to assist in elevating, by the light of civilization and christianity, the degraded and benighted heathen,—I say that the man who come here with such views and feelings—will not need your advice; his very "love of liberty" will constrain him to work to strive earnestly and labor steadily for the moral, political and physical advancement of Liberia. He will not pursue the course of some, who, though they have but lately come to the country, hardly ever the acclimating process, appear so eager for the improvement of Liberia in one particular respect, as to adopt measures which are if not destructive, certainly detrimental to its moral interests. They seem to concentrate all their energies and bend all their efforts to one point—the advancement, according to their notions, of the political interests of Liberia—regardless of the office which their course might have on the general welfare. Now, it seems to me Mr. Herald, that these are not the kind of men that really love Liberia, or that will really benefit it.

It is true, they have zeal but it is not according to knowledge, it is not founded upon experience—hence being blind themselves and undertaking to lead others, it is natural for both they and their followers to fall into the ditch. The fact appears to be, that these men are so lifted up, by the sudden transition from oppression into liberty, so elated with the idea of enjoying, for the first time, the rights and immunities of free citizens; so completely dazzled, by the striking and wonderful light into which they have been unexpectedly introduced, that they act, without reflection; they seem to be carried out of themselves and forget the bounds which should surround them. They become aspirants to some office, and seek, in order to promote their object to produce an entire change in the Government—alter the Constitution &c.

As I said above, I do not believe that such men are any great acquisition to Liberia. But tell me of men, who when they arrive in Liberia will work either by taking their ploughs, and cultivating the soil, and thus assist to improve the country and develop its natural resources; or by enjoying in some other lawful pursuit. Not men who will merely talk and harangue about the improvements that ought to be made—but men who will labor for the advancement of them. These are the kind of men that appreciate and love Liberia, and they are the kind that are most needed at present. To all then who are not of the latter class we reiterate the advice "Go work."

Yours &c.
F. R. Liberia.

Monrovia May 30th 1853.

Mr Editor.—I beg leave to say through your columns, that I have received from President Roberts the remaining half of a ten pound bank note, forwarded to his Excellency by the Rev. T. Scott of Dublin for the benefit of the Episcopal church in this city, for which I beg to return the humble thanks of St Paul's Episcopal Church.

Very truly yours in Christ.

Mormon Marriage

The Mormon paper, the Seer, gives the following account of the formalities observed when a Saint espouses supplementary wives, after he already has one of those companions:

In this church of Latter Day Saints every man is strictly limited to one wife, unless the Lord through the President and Prophet of the church gives a revelation permitting him to take more.—Without such a revelation it would be sinful, according to the Book of Mormon, which this church are required to obey. Hence the Book of Mormon is somewhat more strict than the Bible; for there is nothing in the Bible that limits mankind to one wife, but the Book Mormon does absolutely forbid a man to have more than one wife, unless God shall command otherwise.

No man in Utah who already has a wife and who may desire to obtain another, has any right to make any propositions of marriage to a lady unless he has consulted the President over the whole church, and through him obtain a revelation from God, as to whether it would be pleasing in his sight. If one is forbidden by revelation that ends the matter; if by revelation the privilege is granted, he still has no right to consult the feelings of a young lady, until he has obtained the consent of her parents, provided they are living in Utah; if their consent cannot be obtained, that ends the matter. But if the parents or guardians freely give their consent, then he may make propositions of marriage to the young lady. If she refuses these propositions, this ends the matter; but if she accept, a day is generally set apart by the parties for the marriage ceremony to be celebrated. It is necessary to state that, before any man take the first step toward getting another wife, it is his duty to consult the wife which he already has, and obtain her consent, as recorded in the twenty-fourth paragraph of the revelation, published in the first number of the Seer.

When the day set apart for the solemnization of the marriage ceremony has arrived, the bridegroom and his wife, and also the bride, together with their relatives, & such other guests as may be invited, assemble at the place which they have appointed. The Scribe then proceeds to take the names, ages, native towns, counties, States and countries of the parties to be married, which he carefully enters on record. The President, who is the prophet, seer and revelator over the whole church throughout the world, and who alone holds the key of authority in this solemn ordinance, (as recorded in the second and fifth paragraphs of the Revelation on Marriage,) calls upon the bridegroom, and his wife and the bride to rise, which they do, fronting the President. The wife stands on the left hand of her husband, while the bride stands on her left. The President then puts this question to the wife: "Are you willing to give this woman to your husband, to be his lawful and wedded wife for time and for all eternity? If you are, you will manifest it by placing your right hand within the right hand of your husband." The right hands of the bridegroom and bride being thus joined, the wife takes her husband by the left arm, as in the attitude of walking. The President then proceeds to ask the following question of the man: "Do you, brother (calling him by name.) take sister (calling her by name) by the right hand to receive her unto yourself to be your lawful and wedded wife, and to be her lawful and wedded husband, for time and for all eternity, with a covenant and promise, on your part that you will fulfil all the laws, rites and ordinances pertaining to this holy matrimony, in the new and everlasting covenant, doing this in the presence of God, angels and these witnesses, of your own free will and choice?" The bridegroom answers, yes. The President then puts the question to the bride:

"Do you sister (calling her by name) take brother (calling him by name.) by the right hand, and give yourself to him, to be his lawful and his wedded wife for time and for eternity, with a covenant and promise, on your part, that you will fulfil all the laws, rites, and ordinances pertaining to this holy matrimony, in this new and everlasting covenant, doing this in the presence of God, angels, and these witnesses, of your free will and choice?" The bride answers, yes. The President then says, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the authority of the holy priesthood, I pronounce you legally and lawfully husband and wife for time and for eternity; and I seal upon you blessings of the holy resurrection, with power to come forth in the morning of the first resurrection, clothed with glory, immortality, and eternal lives; and I seal upon you the blessings of thrones, and dominions, and principalities, and powers, and exaltions, together with the blessings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and say unto you, be faithful and multiply, and replenish the earth that you may have joy and rejoicing in your prosperity in the day of the Lord Jesus. All these blessings, together with all other blessings pertaining to the new and everlasting covenant, I seal upon your heads, through your faithfulness unto the end, by the authority of the Holy Priesthood, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen." The Scribe then enters on the general record, the date and place of the marriage, together with the names of two or three witnesses who were present.—Presbyterian Herald

I Held the Baby

Some ten days or a fortnight since a couple of gay young men happened in at a ball given at a public room, where the dancers were not exactly of the "upper ten," but were still very respectable, worthy people.—Presently one of our heroes, a sharp, merry, quizical, fellow, espied in a retired seat, a pretty, elegant looking young lady, who he was certain from her appearance, was not of the class housemaids, nurses, &c. then waiting around him in a waltz.

An introduction was speedily effected, and our young friend, as he expressed it, "spread himself, in order to lay the lady out cold."—He has never been very far out of the city;—but with his usual impudence, glibness of tongue, and picturesqueness of expression, he gave his partner a minute and glowing description of his travels in foreign lands, from Kamschatka of Patagonia, dashing through Europe, glancing at Asia Minor, dropping in at Liberia, and sneezing at California, with Pawnees, confabs with the Czar, soirees with the Sultan, and card parties with Louis Napoleon. The extensive acquaintance the young man possessed with great men of all countries was truly astonishing, and he told so many anecdotes of their free and easy intercourse with him—is yet a youth whose chin mourns a beard that even he himself became a little alarmed at his own boldness; and "drew up his horses."

The young lady listened attentively, smiled amiably, and appeared to be indeed a very well informed person. Our hero was already half-head over-heels in love, but what bothered him was that he did not know who his fair companion was her name address or position. He hemmed and hawed for awhile, after getting through with his travels and stories; and then said insinuatingly

"D'you know, Miss, that when I came into the room I observed Miss Clifton of Prytania street?" "Indeed?"

"Yes, I never saw such a striking resemblance." (Miss Clifton of Prytania street, was of course a fictitious personage.) "D'you know Miss Clifton?"

"Of Prytania street?" "Yes" "No"

"Oh!"

Another pause—slightly awkward. Our friend approached still nearer the 'pumping' operation. Had Miss been at the Varieties soiree? No, she didn't. The first ball at the St Louis was delightful. Should need. Was it possible that Miss had not been there? No she hadn't. But the opera, the delightful opera! Hadn't been there either. Was it possible. Was the distance too great to her hotel? She didn't live at the hotel. It was so much pleasanter to have a private house of one's own. She had no private house.—Ah! Miss prefers furnished rooms. She couldn't bear them!

Another pause more awkward than ever.—Our friend was stumped, but he looked perfectly at his ease, and remained in a graceful attitude, smiling pleasantly at the toes of his patent leather pumps.

Imagine his discomfiture when suddenly the mysterious young lady, looking up to his face with a cunning smile, said.

"I know you!"

Our hero actually blushed. He thought he was caught. The foreign travels would do his business forever and ever, amen.

"You know me! How strange! When did I have the pleasure of making your acquaintance?"

"Oh, some two weeks ago."

"Two week? Strange, I don't remember ever to have met you.

"Do you remember a christening that took place—"

"Oh, yes—at Mrs. E——'s. Were you there?" Yes. I held the baby!"

If ever a young lady was thoroughly analyzed at a glance, that young lady was for just about a second after 'I held the baby' was uttered.

"Well, really—I am much to blame—I can't forgive myself—but I can't possibly recollect a feature of your face."

"Oh, you did not look at me."

"No?"

"Nor speak to me either."

"Don't tell me! And yet you held the baby!"

"Nobody else did, I can assure you."

"I do not know how to make apology for my rudeness. Pray forget it; and next time you hold a baby, I'll speak to you if I die for it."

"Will you?"

"Pon honor!"

"And tell me more of your travels?"

Ye-ye-yes!"

"Well now, if you'll be on Lafayette Square to-morrow afternoon at 5 o'clock, you'll see me there."

"Um! pretty cool that, at a first acquaintance,' thought our hero. "D'you often go on Lafayette Square?"

"Every afternoon with the baby."

"Oh, with the baby!"

"Of course. I am the nurse!"

Since the above eventful night, our young friend from a round, ruddy-faced individual has become wan pale, and thin visaged. He never smiles, and you have only to say 'baby' to him to send him instantly in search of some one around the corner.—Weekly Clipper.

THE WORD "SELAH".—The translators of the Bible have left the Hebrew word SELAH which occurs so often in the Psalms, as they found it, and of course the English reader often asks his minister, or some learned friend, what it means. And the minister or learned has often been obliged to confess ignorance, because it is a matter in regard to which the most learned have by no means been of one mind. The Targums, and most of the Jewish commentators, give to the word the meaning of eternally for ever. Raudi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it a a musical or rhythmical note. Herder regards it as indicating a change of tone. Matheston thinks it, as a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence. Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play, and the singers stop." Wocher regards it as equivalent to sursum corda—up my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four pages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah. They are calls for aid and prays to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not in the imperative, 'Hear, Jehovah!' or 'Awake Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that he would 'remember and hear.'" &c. The word itself he regards as indicating to blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah itself he thinks an abridged expression used for Higgaion Selah—Higgaion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets.—Bibliotheca Sacra

GOLDEN RULES FOR BRIDES.—Resolve every morning to be cheerful that day; and should anything occur to break your resolution, suffer it not to put you out of temper with your husband.

Dispute not with him, be the occasion what it may; but much rather deny yourself the satisfaction of having your own will, or gaining the better of an argument, than risk a quarrel or create a heart-burning, which it is impossible to see the end of.

Implicit submission in a man to his wife is ever disgraceful to both; but implicit submission in a wife to the just will of her husband is what she promised at the altar—what the good will revere her for; and what is, in fact, the greatest honor she can receive.

Be assured, a woman's power as well as her happiness, has no other foundation than her husband's esteem and love, which it is her interest by all possible means, to preserve and increase—share and soothe his cares, and, with the utmost assiduity, conceal his errors.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JUNE 1st, 1853.

Our Country. The more the present condition and prospects of Liberia are considered—whether as regard the disseminating of christianity, and the habits of civilization among the surrounding aborigines—or whether the advancement of our people in those principles which will certainly tend to the elevation of their country in the estimation of the good and wise in other lands—or whether we regard the steady growth of its commerce, and the influence which it exerts on the native Africans on its borders, nothing can be more clear than that the people of Liberia have great cause to thank the great Donor of the universe for the many distinguished favors he has designed to bestow on them. Throughout all our borders peace prevails, and tho it becomes necessary occasionally, to check the turbulence of a few restless chieftians, the great majority of them bow with reverence to the authority of our laws, and their treaty stipulations, and evince, on every occasion, a disposition to court the favor of their civilized neighbors.

It will be remembered that but little more than a quarter of a century ago & where the towns & villages in Liberia now stand, inhabited by a people reared amidst civilization & christianization, and where at stated periods every meet to worship the "God of their Fathers;" were the habitations of a people devoted to superstitious idolatry—worshiping their "Gree-grees" and paying adoration to the "Devil-bush." Barracoons for the purchase of human beings adorned nearly every hamlet within the present jurisdiction of Liberia, and where this city now stands that fruitful of all curses, reared its bloody and murderous standard. It had numerous votaries. To load the slave ships, defenceless towns were destroyed, the inhabitants captured and carried off to fill the slave barricoons—and those two old and unable to labor were cruelly butchered. Such a state of things have long ceased to exist—the slave trade has no longer a foot-hold in our land, and the weak and oppressed are protected by the mild influence of our laws.

We turn from the recollection of these bloody scenes of days that are past, and not again to disgrace our land; and with feelings filled with promise and big with hope, we joyfully enter upon the contemplation of things as they now exist in our land. Liberia now has a civilized population of about ten thousand. They are the inhabitants of three counties, viz, Montserrado, Bassa and Sinoe—their habits are entirely those of persons born in a civilized land, their "numerous and well attended schools attest their efforts, and their desire for the improvement of their children—their churchs for the worship of the great Creator, every where to be seen, bear testimony to their piety, and to their acknowledgement of His Providence. The native African bowing down with them before the living God, declare that from them, feeble as they are, the light of christianity has gone forth, while upon that curse of curses, the slave trade, a deadly blight has fallen as far as their influence extends." It is under these impressions that we write and in doing so, we are not unmindful that many will laugh to scorn, that a handful of people should ape at maintaining their position while surrounded with nearly five hundred thousand natives who might be willing to revive the slave trade, and resort to thei old habits. We have no such fears, & if the influence of the American-Liberians has been such, as to lessen the disposition of the natives to war and rapine up to this time, surely no one possessing an ordinary share of intelligence will doubt their ability in future, to retain the ascendancy they have already acquired. Indeed it is not doubted, that the natives residing immediately in the neighborhood of our counties prefer the present condition of affairs to what it once was. They live in their villages free from fear of any maraudin, party molesting them, and they have no apprehension of being torn from their land and all they hold dear, to freight the slave ship. Any dispute of a serious nature occurring among them are transferred to our government for adjustment, and decision, in almost every case, is approved and acted upon.

Without in the least, exaggerating, the natives are upon the whole, gratified with their improved and improving condition—their numerous wants are supplied—protection of their lives and property are secure, and they pride themselves, many of them do, on having abandoned their old customs, and adopted those of civilized men.

Previous to the abolition of the slave trade on our part of the coast, our trade in African produce was very limited to what it is now—the African has found out, that in prosecuting a legitimate trade, his every want can be met, and the consequence is, that he is far more independent, and have no fears that he may be kidnapped and transported to other lands. If any one, in the least interested in Liberia, will compare the commercial intercourse of foreigners with Liberia now, to what it was some eight years ago, they will perceive that the increase is upwards of two hundred per-cent, and that within the last two years, the annual advance will nearly equal this. We have no interest in misleading those who are unacquainted with the position which Liberia holds to our African neighbors, nor are we careful that what we say, should be received by those who have ever been sceptical of the success of Liberia in accomplishing what its friends prophecied it would. But our aim is to enlighten our own people, and to encourage our friends abroad, to continue their efforts for the advancement of a people who are struggling to redeem their land from worse than Egyptian darkness—and to assist them in the dissemination of the pure doctrines of christianity. The principles of civilization are extensively at work in the land and if no untoward circumstances occur, which at present, we have not the least intimation of in a few years, the soul of the christian and philanthropist visiting ourlands will be rejoiced to witness what our feeble efforts have accomplished by their instrumentality.

Our rainey season has commenced in earnest. Within the last three weeks the rain has come down in torrents, and we fear there will be but little abatement of it, until about the middle of July. Our dry season was unusally warm, and the absence of rain was severely felt.—The knowing ones, in consequence, predict that the rains will be heavy, and will probably hold on longer this year than is often the case. Farmers are not now materially disturbed by the wet-weather, as most of their rice was planted early in the season, and the rain greatly aids its growth. The natives it is beleived, are not as forward, tho' nothing like a scarcity of rice is to be apprehended the coming season. It is confidently reported, that throughout all our borders, the farming operations are on the most extensive scale, and it is well understood that the people, tho' having comparatively speaking, nothing for exportation, are satisfied with the yearly receipts of their produce. We must no be understood as intending to mean that no attention is being paid to articles for exportation, for it affords us much pleasure to say, that in a couple of years it is probable that the exportation of coffee from Liberia will commence in earnest. Such is the general beleif, and from what we have seen on the banks of the noble St. Paul's, and know of in the county of Grand Bassa, such will be the case. The people in the county of Sinoe are equally attentive to agriculture and are making rapid strides to compete with their further advanced citizens in the upper counties. We hope the day is near at hand, when every man, whatever his position is, may find it to his benefit to have an interest in a sugar or coffee plantation.

The trade of this part, of the coast, is known to be now more extensive than ever. It is astonishing how rapidly it unfolds itself. At places, where three years ago, a puncheon of Palm oil could not be procured in a months time, thousands of gallons can now be purchased without much delay. Within sight of our city the natives are constantly employed in making oil, and the quantity procured from them is pretty considerable. At the marts where our merchants have been accustomed to obtain their usual supply of oil, the trade is very lively & from the improvements of the natives in the habits of civilization, it is expected that the trade in oil will annually increase a hundred per cent. Their wants are becoming more numerous—they seek for and readily purchase articles of merchandize, which hitherto were only desired by those reared in the midst of civilization. At the present rate of the the improvement of the natives, it is impossible to speak with any certainty as to the probable increase there will be in our trade in a few years. It will be very large.

Liberia Sugar and Syrup. We have hitherto noticed that our farmers on the St. Pauls' were laboriously engaged in manufacturing their sugar cane. We have now the pleasure of informing our readers, that they have finish grinding their cane, and will supply sugar and syrup at moderates prices. Persons wishing to examine these articles will call at the ware-houses of U. A. M. Gill & Bro:—and John N. Lewis who have lots on hand, and will be most happy to sell on fair conditions.

Rice continues to be scarce, and command high prices. There is no probability of a change in the price of this article till late in October.

Appointment by the President. John N. Lewis received from the President on the 14th ult: the appointment of Secretary of State.

GOOD ADVICE.—A poor man came to a pious minister, and said, "Mr. C., what will become of me? I work hard and fare hard, and yet I cannot thrive." Mr. C. answered, "Still you want one thing; I will tell you what you shall do; work hard, and fare hard, and pray hard, and I will warrant you shall thrive."

POETRY

MY HEART IS SAD.

My heart is sad, and sorrow's weight,
Hangs heavy on my breast,
For as I gaze upon the stars,
Which twinkle in the west,
I think of her who like the stars,
Was holy, pure, serene,
But who has now departed hence
To light another scene.

I hear the sweet and soothing sound,
Of the deep Sabbath bell;
It wafts my thoughts to heaven's clime,
Where she has gone to dwell;
And in my inmost soul I wish
That I too were at home:—
That I might soar on angels wings
Far up in that bright dome.

There would I seize my golden harp,
And songs of joy would raise:
Would strike upon its sounding strings
While singing hymns of praise,
I'd sing of Him who died for all,
Who pardons every sin,
Who opens wide sweet mercy's door,
That all may enter in.

There would I meet my dear loved friend,
And clasp her to my heart;
Where time, nor death, nor sorrow's hand,
Can ever make us part:
And there at rest in realms of bliss,
No power shall us sever,
But we shall there each other love,
Forever and forever. —True Union.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

ITS POSITION AND PROSPECTS.

Continued.

Immense tracts of excellent land are lying waste, and the population of the interior is crowding into the metropolis in distress for bread. The impoverished Exchequer was temporarily relieved some years ago by the issue of notes bearing interest, as medium of circulation. These, which have sunk three per cent. below par, have been called in during the present year, and a new issue has been made, (partly of a much smaller denomination,) but without interest. It is a puzzle to political economists to understand how under such a system, the wheels have been kept moving so long a time, and a still greater puzzle how they are to be kept agoing for any time to come. Some have imagined that not only diplomacy, but money has been resorted to by some of the foreign powers to secure their ends in Turkey. On this point I have no knowledge, but I have noticed one fact, for which I could not satisfactorily account. For the last two or three years there has been an immense proportion of gold and silver in circulation here. We are now quite familiar with the Russian imperial, the ruble, half ruble, &c., and these coins are quite as fixed in their value and as well known as the Turkish. How come they here? Not a single Turkish product of any amount finds a market in Russia; on the contrary, wheat, linseed, tallow, butter, and many other things are constantly flowing in from thence. By what course of regular business such quantities of Russian coin should find their way to this country I cannot conjecture, though the fact may admit of an explanation among the knowing ones.

"That the doom of this country is sealed I have no manner of doubt. The Ottoman power will never be restored. Islamism, or the faith of Mohammed, has ever formed the basis of its laws and usages as well as its great conservative power, and Islamism must pass away; neither the spirit and tendencies of the age, nor the prophetic revelations of God will allow us to believe that it can much longer retain its influence over the mind of men, and with the fall of Islamism, the government itself will crumble to pieces."—Bicknell's Reporter.

MASONIC.

Mr. Gibbs:

In order that your readers may be "posted up," as the saying is with regard to what is going on in the vicinity of Dover, as well as in your own town, I send you a brief account of a Masonic gathering, which took place in the village of Great Falls on the evening of Monday Dec. 27th, the anniversary of St. John the Evangelist, an eminent Patron of the order.

The gathering was for the purpose of Installing the officers of LIBANUS LODGE, of Free and accepted Masons, into the respective offices to which they had been chosen; with such ceremonies as were masonically appropriate to the occasion. And probably, one object of the "Fraternity" in this assembling, was, to afford the public generally, an opportunity for drawing inferences, favorable, or otherwise, as they might, from what they were permitted to see, and hear, on the occasion, of the probable tendency, and merits of the Institution. Thus, while public curiosity could to some extent be gratified, in relation to an ancient Institution, which has stood firm, and unfaltering during the rise and fall of Empires, and amidst the shocks, and ravages of Time, a tolerable opportunity was afforded to lead the thoughtful mind to judge of the moral tendancy of the craft, from what was evinced in the Instructions imparted to the officers called to preside over its affairs.

Agreeably to previous arrangement, the Lodge left their hall over the Counting Room of the Manufacturing Establishment, and arrived at the Town Hall at 8 o'clock, was found well filled with a goodly share of the Intelligence, Fashion, and Beauty of the place.

After the performance of a highly appropriate Anthem by an excellent Choir, a Prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Greenwood of your town, a member of the Fraternity, advanced to a high Degree; when the respective officers elect, were presented for Installation by R. W. Grand Marshal BLACKMAR.

The Installing officer was R. W. JACOB C HANSON, M D. District Deputy Grand Master, who proceeded, as they were presented, (from the W M down to the Tyler,) in a very quiet and dignified manner, to perform the ceremony of Installation by presenting to each the "Jewel" and badge of his office, accompanied by an appropriate Address. This exercise was listened to with the most eager attention, by the large auditory present; at the close of which, the Principal officers, and, the Brethren of the Lodge, were addressed in an appropriate charge, by the Rev. Chaplain. The Marshal was then directed by the Installing officer, to make Proclamation that "the officers of Libanus Lodge are duly Installed."

This being done the following Hymn was sung by the choir in a very effective manner:

When darkness veiled the hopes of man,
Then Light with radiant beams, began
To cheer his clouded ways;
In graceful form, to sooth his woes,
Then Beauty to his vision rose,
In bright and gentle ray.

Immortal Order stood confessed,
From farthest East to distant West,
In columns just and true;
The faithful Plumb and Level there,
Uniting with the trusty Square,
The temple brought to view.

Descending then from Heaven most high,
Came Charity with tearful eye
To dwell with feeble man;
Hope whispered peace in brighter skies,
On which a trusting Faith relies,
And earth's best joys began.

Abroad was seen the boon of HEAVEN;
Fraternal Love was kindly given,
And touched each kindred heart;
The sons of Light, with transport thon,
In kindness to their fellow men,
Unveiled the gentle Art.

Let grateful paeans loudly rise,
O'er earth's domains, to azure skies,
As time shall onward move!
A Brother's joy and woe shall be
Undying bond so mark the free,
To wake a Brother's love.

Then followed an Address by R. W. ICHABOD G. JORDAN It was of little more than an hour in length, replete with sound, and convincing argument, and containing many passages of descriptive brilliancy, and beauty.

The object of the Address was, to give a succinct history of the order of Free-Masons, from its origin down; and to meet such objections as are popularly urged against it He was followed by his hearers with unabated attention, & interest, to the close, which is one of the best arguments for the ability, and power of the Address But, whatever any might be disposed to think of the merits of the order whose cause he plead all will doubtless concede that his address was one of masterly power, and alike creditable to the head and heart of the author, and well sustained the reputation he has long enjoyed with those in whose midst he resides, as a gentleman of mental power and just discrimination. We are confident that the Address given to the public through the Press, would be read with interest, and make a favorable impression with regard to the Institution it was designed to vindicate.

After the Address, the following Hymn was sung by the choir in whos praise it seems almost impossible to speak too highly. Were it not unjust to discriminate, where all acquitted themselves admirably it would be pleasant to speak of one female voice, which for a happy combination of power, brilliancy, sweetness, and remarkable distinctness of vocalisation, could not easily be surpassed.—Most certainly the company present were in no small degree indebted to the excellent performance of the choir, for the entertainment they enjoyed:

Mark where friends united stand,
True of heart and free of hand,
Brothers own his just command,
Who rules in social hour:
Hark! he calls! obedient now,
Still and silently we bow;
Love impressed on every brow;
We own his rightful power.

While in kindness gathered here,
Voices joined and hearts sincere,
Discord' notes be never near,
Bringing thoughts unkind;
Constant to our social tie,
Honor beams from every eye;
Who, that shall his trust deny,
Manhood's grace shall find?

Who, that joys of friendship know,
Who, that feels for other's woe,
Who, when tears of sorrow flow,
Coldly turn away?
At the words, in whispers told,
That to Brothers truth unfold,
Who would grateful thanks withhold?
Who would friends betray

Gather, then, with hearts upright,
Where the East gives forth its light;
Give we now our solemn plight,
In fraternal love;
Soon our earthly labors o'er,
Bliss immortal yet in store,
Each find a happier shore,
Blessed with light above.

We regret that it is not in our power to give the names of the officers Installed, but owing to the position in which we sat, and the lowness of the voice of the Marshal who announced them, we were unable to record them. On the whole the exercises were appropriate and interesting. —Reporter.

FAITH'S HARD FIGHT.

It is not easy to walk by faith. "Who is sufficient for these things?" What need have the best of us with increasing earnestness to cry, "Lord, increase our faith!" Among things seen, to love the unseen—to be in the world and not of it—to live below and yet to dwell above—never to forget our home yonder, in the sunniest hours of a home here—to obey the apostolic injunction, for them who have wives to be as though they had none—for them that weep to be as though they wept not—for them that rejoice, to be as though they rejoiced not—for them that buy, to be as those that possessed not—for a king to remember that he is but a beggar at his prayers—for a Lazarus at the gate to remember that he shall be a king in glory—to believe that God is kind when his hand is smiting and his flesh smarting—to be content that Christ came down into our garden and plucked the sweetest flower in unblown bud or blossom, even to place it in his own bosom—when the screws goes into the coffin, and the mould rattles hollow on its lid, to rise to the scene where the spirit shines and sings in glory—these, I grant, are no easy things.

Faith has a hard fight of it, but she shall have a grand victory—a rough passage of it, but she shall have a happy landing. Angels throng the shore—Jesus, with a train of saints, awaits the believer's coming. To those who mourn departed saints, we say, "Weep not for the dead." Happy are they who are anchored in the desired haven—they are with the Lord—they are at home—they are at rest; and is not that better than to be left to battle here with fierce tempests and a troubled sea?—The Presbyterian.

CREEDS AND FORMULAS.

THE RIGHT OF PRIVATE JUDGMENT.

We have been highly gratified with an article on the above subject, in the Lutheran Observer of last week. The wide promulgation of such true and noble sentiments cannot fail to undermine all "traditions of men," which yet mar the purity of the Lutheran Church, and to lead every man to "search the Scriptures" alone for his faith and practice. We make the following selections, and ask for them the special notice of our readers.

If we understand the great principle for which Luther contended, it was the right of private judgment; and if we understand the great benefit which the Reformation of the sixteenth century conferred upon mankind, it was the privilege of exercising this right. It was upon this principle Luther acted, when he proclaimed to the world, as an individual, who had ventured to think and investigate for himself, the gospel doctrine of justification by faith, and when he condemned openly and boldly these erroneous opinions and pernicious practices which conflicted with this primary doctrine of the christian system. We believe it is conceeded by all, that Luther did not wish those, who sympathized with him, to adhere to his views, and statements of scripture doctrine, any farther than they would bear the test of the most searching comparison with the teachings of the Word of God; and that whilst he entertained no doubt as to the great primary truths which he maintained, he did admit the possibilty of being in the wrong in regard to some minor points, which did not involve questions and principles of fundamental importance. * * * *

The Scriptures after all are to be the court of ultimate appeal, the authority by which all questions of doctrine are to be determined. We have no fear of dicussions carried on in this spirit and with this concession. The danger begins only when the authority of the Word of God and our right to appeal to it are denied; and when it is contended that ancient opinions put forth by reformers and expressed in creeds, are to be received by us without discussion, and without being subjected to the ordeal of private judgment based upon fair, honest and enlightened exegesis.

The very spirit of the Lutheran Church is progressive It is to be known and distinguished, not only as a reformed, but as a reforming and advancing church As it took the lead in the work of biblical interpretation, so must it keep in advance of all others in that same work. This must be the mark of its identity. It must be foremost in liberating the mind from the schackles of human authority, and binding it to God and his truth. On its standard must be inscribed "the Bible, the BIBLE, the only and a sufficient rule of faith and practice." We will hereafter attempt to show that this is not opening the door of latitudinarianism; that he is indeed the best and most consistent Lutheran who comes nearest to Luther in his admiration of the Word of God, and the strength of his purpose always to appeal from human authority to that word, and who is most ready and determined always to abandon every opinion that conflicts with that Word, though it had been promulgated by Luther himself. No one would honor such independence, or rather such entire dependence upon the best and safest of all guides, more than the great reformer.—True Union.

A Great Change

A gentleman in the State of New York, who had been a very successful farmer and merchant, died, and left a large estate to his sons. They were sober, industrious, active, and enterprising; they prospered in their business, and rapidly accumulated property. The accumulation increased the desire for, and they made haste to be rich. They grew uneasy at resting on the Sabbath, and began to continue their business on that day. They hired labourers to work on the Sabbath, and, in some cases, could get them cheaper than they could other days. Their whole souls seemed to be swallowed up in the one idea of accumulating wealth But they had not continued long, after they began openly to do business on the Sabbath, before it was evident that they were losing as to character They began also to lose as to property, and one loss followed another till, through mismanagement and losses, they became bankrupts, and finally abandoned, vicious, and miserable. Said a most intelligent and respectable observer, "Few men ever seemed to prosper more, while they continued to observe the Sabbath; and few ever ran down faster, as to character and property, after they began openly and habitually to profane it."—The Presbyterian.

Best sort of language for the Pulpit—The vicar in a certain village in England, returning one Sunday from Church, was thus accosted by an oppulent farmer: "Well doctor," said he, "you be gwain on pretty well now; but why don't ye gi' us now and than a scrap of Lat. in?" "Why," said the vicar, "if I had thought it had been your wish, I should have had no objection, but for one thing—I am afraid you would not understand it." "That," said the other, is nought to you, and we do say vor the best, we oft to ha' the best."—True Union.

THERE are twenty-one newspapers published in California—one religious, eight political, and twelve neutral, or nominally such.—Ibid

Three hundred converted Jews are now engaged in various parts of the world, in preaching that Jesus Christ is "He that was to come."

LIBERIA HERALD

Grand Election Celebration at Buchanan

Mr Herald:

The long expected celebration of the success of the Administration Party in the last election campaign, came off in this city, yesterday, in grand style with great demonstrations of joy. Heaven was propitious, and all nature seemed to smile.

At aurora a thundering cannon announced the arrival of the happy day, and aroused us from our slumbers to enjoy the most enthusiastic, agreeable and patriotic celebration, we have ever witnessed in Liberia

We cannot give an adequate description of the demonstrations of joy from hundreds of warm hearts inflamed with patriotism and emulously vying to excell; we shall therefore merely attempt to draw a sketch of the scene,

As the luminary of day arose, we were called upon to "arise shine," by the cannon's roar. At nine o'clock A. M. fleets of canoes and boats with banners flying, were seen on the beautiful St John's, and floating within bearing a number of ladies and gentlemen from the sister settlements of this county.

At 10. A. M. the procession being formed, a cannon gave the signal to march. The procession then paraded with music, a gorgeous display of banners through the city. Some of the devices were well designed, and were quite striking. Among the many MOTTOS we notice the following. "Honor to whom honor is due;" "J. J. Roberts and S. A. Benson; our wise choice, and them we have." "The wisdom of Liberia vet lies in her majority." "We shall be heard through the ballot box;" (with a neat picture of the ballot box); and many others, too numerous to mention. But, above them all, there towered a large white banner with blue trimmings, with a ballot box was represented in the centre, an eye looking down into the opening, and with the words above.—"By this" and below—"We rule;" and at each corner of those lines were hands pointing to the Ballot box; and higher still, the "Lone Star," that emblem of our nationality floated gloriously in the air, followed by a large concourse of citizens, who resorted to the residence of the Vice President elect, to escort him and the Senators and Representatives elect, in their triumphal procession to the banquet, prepared under a large canopy of palms in Atlantic Street, fronting "Johnson's Hotel." The cannon announced their arrival, the procession halted in front of the Vice President elect. The V. P. escorted by the Senators and Representatives of the County, was introduced to the assembly by D. H. Rouch Marshall of the day, amid the most enthusiastic cheering. Dr. Jas. S. Smith, then spoke as follows:"

FELLOW CITIZENS,—

This is truly an occasion befitting speech, and much may be said with complacency to ourselves, and complimentary to those that we have honored to represent us. But as all are familiarly acquainted with the merits of the individuals we have elected to the Presidency and the niches they have inscribed in the temple of fame, of the many signal services they have done their country, of their tried integrity, of their unrivaled patriotism and in short of their accomplishments in all of the graces of good citizens and statesmen—in view of your knowledge of these facts, I think it unnecessary to commend them to your admiration, as they are already classed in your estimation among the stars, while the nations of earth acknowledge the justice of your decision

It is peculiarly gratifying, however, that we have nothing to fear in the "Ballot-box," that through it the majority rule, and that there is succeeded merely in the last election campaign but that we had an overwhelming majority, it proves that there is yet wisdom in Liberia to rule.

And now allow me to remind you fellow citizens, that if we are true to our Country, if we keep a circumspect eye on the Ballot-box, our peace and liberty will be secure and Liberia will prosper. We must remember that we are a nation of sovereigns, each of us is a sovereign, and hold in our hands our destiny, and represent our sovereignty through the ballot-box; —all power is vested in us we set up whom we will and whom we will we cast down. All our happiness and prosperity depends on the judicious use of this privilege. It is the greatest, earthly blessing man can enjoy Let us therefore keep a strict guard over the ballot box

We are a portion of Liberia's proud sons who are identified with the standard bearers of our Country, consequently we have been styled the "Administration Party." Feeling that the Government has adhered to the Constitution, has maintained and defended its rights, preserved the majesty of the laws and sustained the dignity of our Republic; we have thought fit to continue the present incumbent in the Presidential Chair another term, and to appoint as his associate our worthy patriotic citizen, Stephen A. Benson, and so do we declare it.

We had, however, to stem a strong current, as the tide had changed and many were calling for a change. Yea, some were crazy for a change, and we had crafty men to contend with, who tried to gull us with preaching "so that we intended to make Joe a king," but it was all in vain, we weighed them in the balance and found them wanting, and elected in a true Republican spirit the tried friends of Liberia, and those in whose integrity and ability we reposed unshaken confidence.

We have gained the day, and the "Lone Star" now waves in a clear blue sky as we cry Hurrah! Hurrah!! Hurrah!!!

This being the case, and seeing that we have slain our fatlings and all things being ready, we have come hither in triumpal procession to congratulate our V. President elect, Stephen A. Benson, and our representatives elect, request their participation in our mirth and festivities, and to escort them to our banquet.

Fellow Citizens, our officers elect, we have placed in your hands by our deliberate suffrages the destiny of Liberia, and do repose implicit confidence in your integrity and patriotism. To you are entrusted, and those associated with you, our every interest. As we possess a country whose resources are as inexhaustible as the ocean, a country from whose mountains there flow rivers of gold, and whose limits are destined to be bounded only by the seas, it is with you and each of you to engrave your names on the pages of history and bequeath to your country immortal honors or lasting shame. Seeing that such weighty responsibilities devolve upon you, it is the fond wish of your fellow citizens, that you be zealous in guarding our common cause, covet the best gifts, consecrate yourselves to your country's good, and seek the guidance of unerring wisdom.

With these remarks we present you with the "Lone Star." Here the bearer advanced gracefully with the orator at his side toward the V P. and other officers elect, while the "Star of the free" waved majestically over their heads. May you ever protect it, and may it ever protect you. We commit it to your care, it is the emblem of our nationality, it is our only hope and we shall always rally around it. Allow us to remind you fellow citizens that you are the representatives of a nation, that you have lost your individuality or that, that individuality has been magnified, that a false step in you will not be that of an individual only, but it will involve the disgrace of a nation, your glory will be a nation's glory.

You fellow citizens henceforth will watch your career with solicitude, the eyes of the world are turned toward you and follow you to the public halls and to your private dwellings.

In public and private you represent the honor of Liberia, the world and your fellow citizens will henceforward know of you no private action that will not effect a nation's welfare.

And now fellow citizens having declared you as our representatives we leave you in possession of the Lone Star, the ballot box we keep, on our support you may depend. And we congratulate ourselves that we have men in whose wisdom in that majority. There is therefore cause for the greatest joy, that we have men in whose hands we can commit the destiny of Liberia We would therefore say to you come and let us serve you one day more, then go and serve us!!

Long and loud were the hearty responses and echoes of different sentiments from the audience as the speaker proceeded, and when he ceased speaking, the drums rolled, the flags waved, and the cannons roared hurrah!!

Then all was calm, and the Vice President elect, in a most vivid and pathetic, manner spoke of President Roberts', disinterested services for his country, his extreme vigilance, his tried integrity, his masterly ability, and his unrivaled patriotism; that he was emphatically the Washington of Liberia. as he proceeded, the audience cried, yes, yes! hear! hear!! &c: and many were the hurrahs while the drums rolled and many of the fair Dtughters of Liberia waved their handkerchiefs from the windows and piazzas.

But with pathos he referred to his reminiscense in Liberia during 31 years, his hopes and his fears, his captivity, his devotedness to Liberia &c, the audience seemed greatly moved while crystal gems stole in their eyes. As for the speaker when he remembered his low estate, of the unimportance of his public services, he was astounded on finding himself elevated to the highest office loss one in the gift of an enlightened people. Had he the tongue of an Angel, language would fail him to describe the emotions he felt and the deep sense of gratitude within him. In conclusion he remarked "I this day pledge my faith to you and Liberia, if I forget the interest of Liberia, if I prove recreant to my Country, it I become insubordinate to her laws or tolerate it in others, if I am found sanctioning the acts of those who attempt to subvert the Government, if I prove unfaithful to my trust, may the judgement of Heaven descend upon me in that self-same hour, may I be branded with infamy, may I die the death of a traitor, and may the infamy of my act descend to my latest posterity."

Then did the welkin ring with shouts for Roberts & Benson. while the Ladies beamed forth rich smiles on the concourse, and casted a beautiful shower of garlands upon them.

The citizens then took a glass of wine amid a general congratulations.

The procession was then formed and marched with the officers as above mentioned to "Johnsons Hotel," and committed them to the care of the Ladies, who sang in syren strains, some verses composed by a Son of Africa for the occasion; and ate with them a nice cake prepared for the occasion. It would be unpardonable in us were we to forget to inform you, that at South's bridge a most beautiful triumphal arch was erected, under which the procession marched on returning, erected by the Ladies of this city, while the procession was at the Vice President's elect, whereon was inscribed "A debt to our choice, J. J. Roberts. & S. A. Benson"

Dinner being ready the guests repaired around the festive board and the cannon bade them eat a national dinner under a canopy of Heaven, and the guests regailed themselves most sumptuously, for there were many of the good things of life daintily served up, upon the strength of which, they gave as many beautiful and important sentiments. perhaps it would not be amiss to give the substance of one or two of the toasts, as follows; "Here is success hoping that S. A. Benson will be our next President."—Free voting without the promise of office" (loud cheers) &c.

While the gentlemen were at dinner the ladies were accommodated at "Johnson's Hotel" where suitable preparations had been made.

Dinner being over the procession walked to the point and embarked for Edina, and as they passed the dwellings of the officers elect in that city they gave three cheers. The procession marched up the front street of Edina, and as it reached its extremity, they were seen from the mound where the Ladies had gathered to receive them, and they were saluted by a cannon, as they were about to ascend the hill, they were again saluted. They halted in front of Rev. Jno. H. Cheesman's, at the gate, over which was a wreath of garlands. The Rev. Gentleman then spoke in behalf of the Ladies as follows.

To the Vice President elect.

Sir.

I have the honor in behalf of the Ladies of Edina to congratulate you on your election to the high post of honor to which, by the suffrage of your fellow citizens you have been raised. Be assured sir that we highly appreciate your merits and feel fully satisfied that in making a selection our citizens have done honor to themselves and the Republic

You are aware sir, that too long a dark cloud has hung over the County of Grand Bassa, and for causes known to yourself the reproaches of our neighbors have been upon us, not because there were not latent talents which would be eventually developed; but because that precious gem virtue was apparently in too many instances wanted But the epoch of our history is changed the subject of ethics are being brought before our communities, and many are its advocates, and to say we feel assured that soon the County of Grand Bassa, will not be behind, in any virtue, the other Counties of this Republic. Having resolved to raise the standard of morality and virtue—to stand closely by it ourselves, and to invite the attention of the rising generations to the vast benefits to be derived from it, we feel proud that we have at the head of our government those who will ever encourage it.

You sir we regard as being fully Liberian, suffered for her—borne away as a captive in the days of her adversity, by the savage foe—preserved by the Providence of God and restored to the bosom of your distressed friends, and to day stands among the first in your Counties esteem.

With you sir and our worthy President Joseph J. Roberts at our head, our country is safe and we have nothing to fear. Let the savage war whoop be heard and entire destruction threatened, we fear not, while a Roberts and a Benson stand at the head of affairs Yes sir we feel that our children whom we love so dearly are secure and will not be torn from our bosoms to suffer the cruelties of savage ferocity.

We mean not to say, nor would we have it understood, that we repose our trust alone in the arm of flesh, nay, far be it from us, but we regard you as the instrumentality and rejoice that the instruments employed in the repelling of foes so strongly indicates the favor of the Great Jehovah May you long live to enjoy the honors confered by your nation. To conclude sir I again congratulate you, hoping that in you the Ladies may ever find a defender of virtue and an opposer of vice.

To Hon: John Hanson.

And you venerable sir, having long served in your Country's cause, we cannot pass by, and conclude these brief remarks without tendering to you our sincere thanks for the deep interest you have ever taken in Liberia's weal. You sir we honor to be the Ladies advocate and in that, as well as your political career have truly distinguished yourself! By you in the first settlement of this place stood the ever to be remembered Col: William L. Weaver, whose mortal remains he entombed in your burying ground, but whose memory is engraven upon our hearts, and your silvery locks too plainly demonstrate to us that you have almost ended you career, but sir while you can use a single word, we shall expect you to advocate your country's cause and when called from the stage of action may some one of Edina's sons stand by to catch the mantel.

To the Young men.

Young men arise and like our worthy Vice President elect distinguish yourselves, by your industry enterprize and devotedness to your country's interest, arouse the latent powers of your mind—bring them into requisition & show to the world that the County of Grand Bassa can give birth to as noble sons, as any in the world not confining ourselves to Liberia, whatever their color may be. You are men in common with others, a branch of the same parent stock, and why not be equal with any in every particular. The yoke is thrown off, the voice of the oppressor is not heard, and to day while we give a full demonstration of our confidence in the President and Vice President elect, every son of Liberia may raise high his voice and exclaim Liberty and Equality."

They were then requested to enter, and walked on a white carpet, strewed with flowers as they advanced by.

The concourse having entered an ode was sang, after which the Vice President elect gallantly responded to the eloquent address made him by the Ladies through their respectable organ; it was quite sentimental and every sentence breathed forth a spirit of true patriotism, as well as a high estimation of female influence. He had not only given his influence but determined to the utmost to cause female influence to have its due weight in community. He was proud of the Daughters of Liberia, greater patriotism could not be evinced by any one than they had displayed. He felt assured that Liberia would never lack for "mothers" if their daughters followed their example.

Hon: Jno. Hanson then addressed the audience in an eloquent strain and convinced all who heard him that he had drank deep at the fountain of patriotism.

Capt. Dyer, British Merchant, was moved upon to speak by some kind allusions made by the Hon: J. Hanson. He assured us that there were many Englishmen whose hearts beat in unison with ours, who cherish fondly the cause of Liberia, that it laid near their hearts That though he could not class himself among the patrons of Liberia. He had always since his acquaintance with Liberia entertained a high estimate of Liberian character, and that he has ever since felt a lively interest in the prosperity of Liberia. He believe from his intercourse with the citizens of Liberia that the people had made the very best choice. The history of the Vice President elect, showed what may be accomplished by the exercise of true principles; from among the least he had become second to none in the community, from a captive, a ruler. In conclusion he gave Victoria as the ladies best friend and model. The captian seemed to enter with spirit into all exercises of the day, responded gallantly to the toasts drank to Her Britanic Majesty, and evinced in all his actions that he retained the truth of an inscription on one of the banners "Liberia the land of equality."

Those who have never been to Liberia may justly question the validity of that sentiment, but those who have witnessed harmony of feeling subsisting between men of different complexion in Liberia, will acknowledge its truth Here the colored man the African, * * * * if you please with irresistable eloquence demonstrates that he is endowed with all the finer sensibilities of our nature, and all who see if he possess the feelings of a man, admire and commune with him. I appeal to your experience Mr. Herald But to proceed, after many hearty congratulations with our Edina friends, the procession returned to Buchannan just as the sun was dipping the western horrizon, and cannon saluted the setting sun of a day long to be remembered with us. The Vice President elect and officers were then escorted to "Johnsons Hotel" The citizens then turned in different directions to prepare their lanterns and flambeaus for a torch light procession. At 7 o'clock P. M the city was illuminated and all things being ready, the procession formed in front of the hotel, received the Vice President elect at the door, placed him in a palanquin and marched with splendor brilliantly around the city—after which they proceeded to his own mansion reaching thither, they made a circuit around the house amid the enthusiastic cheers of the procession while every window was filled with ladies waving white handkerchiefs. Among the illuminations, we notice the house of Edward Liles Esqr. every window of which appeared as a beautiful gallaxy of six or more stars.

At the Vice President's elect, cake and wine went around. & many fine sentiments delivered, and fire works were displayed until ten o'clock, when each retired to his own house full of joy, thus ended one of the brightest days we ever saw

Allow me Mr. Herald to congratulate our party on their success we hope that they will always proceed with that deliberation and circumspection that has hitherto distinguished them, and we hope also, that all Liberia will concur with us. "That so long as Liberia select men who have been matured on her soil she is safe"

Yours truly,
BASSA.

Tune Olivet or Trinity.

1. Come true Liberians;
Come, sing the Patriot's song
That we are free;
Our glorious country's free,
Will never bow our knee;
From Tyrants galling claims,
Liberia is free.

2 'Tis free, yes, glorious news,
And while in Roberts' hands
We need not fear,
We've Benson at his side,
A true Liberian tried.
And what have we to fear;
God is their guide.

3. But do you wish to see,
Liberia's glory lost
Our Star disgrac'd?
Then trust to selfish hands
Your dear—bought rights; your land
And all your boasted pride
Will then be lost.

4 But now the contest's over,
Our party asks no more,
The victroy's ours,
For Liberty we fought
And not for paltry gain
as others who delight
In Confusion.

5 For Lo! Behold and see,
How high your Star ascends,
High up in air,
It climbs, it climbs, O yes!
Liberia's polar star,
T'will guide us ever more.
Our Country's saved.

6. Ye muses of the East,
Come help to raise the song,
That we are free,
Liberian daughter- say,
Do not you feel the flame,
Which doth our breasts inspire?
Then chant it loud.

7. But where's our Country's God,
Who've led us all along
Through dangers deep—
To thee we give the praise,
Protect our rulers still,
And for our country's good.
The we implore
Africanus.

ANOTHER STATES-MAN FALLEN!!

Hon: Daniel B. Warner.

Respected Sir:—Feeling sensibly the deep interest you take in the memory of the individual.—the dying echo of whose death warning knell, still falls upon our ear with melancholly notes as the striking monitor of time; telling us of the sad bereavement this infant nation is called upon to suffer by the death of Hon. Hilary Teage, late Secretary of State, which occured on the evening of the 21st of May, after a short, but painful illness.

An occurence of such deep solemnity, awakens a train of reflection in the human mind, however, dark, and gives him thought upon days, months, and years past by. The perspicuity of this all important agent of man's reason, has been from time immemorial exercised in various ways—until we find in this our day, the wonderful transaction of nations and men, chronicled for posterity. Through this agency, arises in our breast a halo of glory; in memory of the imperishable existence of one, whose character as a citizen, states-man and patriot, will ever be remembered by every Liberian.

Since it has become the rule and example of nations, past and present, to notice particularly, and with great earnest of principle, the memorable deeds of its distinguished statesmen;—I deem it to be the peculiar duty of every Liberian, to bring his offering of respect, and sacrifice it to the memory of one, never to be forgotten, and ever to be lamented citizen.

In recording the memorable transactions of this infant nation, you will find that the subject of this memoirs character, run parallel with its history from its most infant date Indeed, when speaking of so worthy a personage, one is at a loss for language to express truly his worth! Were we to attribute to him all that is noble in a christian statesman, whose whole life had been spent in laboring for the advancement of his beloved country; we should still fall far short of expressing fully our gratitude, for the past services of so noble a man. To say the least of him, he was the chiefest luminary in our political sky His statesman like abilities were manifested, under that gentlemanly simplicity of character, and affableness of manners, that obliged all who knew him, to admire his splendid quatilies, and respect his eminent talent. There was no display of arrogant ambiguity seen in any of his movements, which oftimes is the consonant character of men of great literary profession; but his illustrious character was emblazoned with that constant liberal hospitality—the true fruit of a capacious cultivated mind. This made him a terror to those who ignorantly envied his abilities, and the hope of those who through him, obtained that justice, which otherwise they would have been deprived.

It is not our purpose, however praiseworthy we may be inclined to speak of so amiable a genius, to say, that he was beyond all others of the human family, the most perfect. He, like other men, had his infirmities; but we call upon you, honest reader, not to adopt his vices; but let them be buried forever; practice his virtues, and sedulously court his graces. His foibles, when brought into contradistinction with his political worth, bear no semblance whatever, but are lost, forever lost in the shade and galaxy of the past. His virtues shown bright in that urban dignity of manners which is the characteristic principle of a gentleman and scholar. In social life, he was open, clear in words, capable of correcting and imparting instruction to the rudest mind, with that evenness of temper, who disrobed him of all presumption, and made his company desireable.

It appears that he was created for the circumstances, age, and political condition of his country,—and there was no vicissitude in its political career, however difficult, but what with his oneness of spirit, he was ready at all times, to ward off the arrows of destruction, designed to annihilate the vital interest of traduced Liberia. Weep Liberians! clothe yourselves in the garment of mourning, for, from among you, a great man has been called away, wherefore ye need be sorrowful.

In fine, let Greece boast of her Solon the lawgiver, by whom industry, justice and order were made the existence of a peaceful and happy commonwealth. Let Rome boast of her Numa the lawgiver, by whom she saw the cresent waves of peace, continually rolling, and with their springs extinguished wars, cruel ravages and murders, giving a healthy existence to liberty. Liberia shall also boast of her Hilary Teage, a lawgiver as zealous as Solon, devout as Numa; but possessing none of their pagan principles. His name in Liberia, is parallel with the renown men of Rome and Greece, whose characters, the great Plutarch has emblazoned with so much taste.

From these, we look for nothing but to hear, and read of their renowned enterprises from conquest to conquest: and from great statemen, have we great reason to look for nothing, but what is noble, great and magnanimous, though in this case, even extreme degeneracy in his last days, would not have made him any the less worthy of the praise of this people; nevertheless, when truth shall be emancipated from its chains of slavery, and the ends of our institution of liberty be made up by the impartial historian, then it will be told, that of those, upon whom we have looked as Liberian standards, he occupied the conspicuous correlative position—and that far upon the escutcheon of our national honor, he shines with undiminished luster, as the author of that sacred article of our liberty, the "Declaration of Independence"

The examples we have endeavored to give, are such as are given by Gregory, "that patterns may have upon us the force, that precepts have have not. The French have a saying also, that "a good man is a mixed man," and there hardly was a being within our knowledge of whom we are more sensible of a mixture of two principles, quick conception, and original forcast, than the subject under consideration.

When Cyrus the younger marched with a great force to dispute the crown with his brother Artaxerxes, occasion by the death of his father Darious Ochus, there accompanied him an Athenian named Xenophon, whom respect for one of his generals had induced to engage in such a hazzardous enterprise, and of whom nothing apparently was known in the beginning of the campaign, more than a volunteer; but who notwithstanding, shared in the sorrows and distresses of the army. When Cyrus was killed, and through the treachery of Tessaphernes the Grecian army was deprived of most of its leading men, the impudence of an insulting Lydian drew from Xenophon a sharp reproof which attracted the notice of Cheirisophus, who had heretofore looked upon this disciple of Socrates but disdainfully—now driven by necessity, exclaims! "before this time O Xenophon! I knew no more of you than that you were an Athenian; but now I commend both your words and actions, and wish we had many in the army like you, for it would be a general good."—So it was with the subject in hand, whenever serious political difficulties threatened us, the same language is applicable: before this O Teage! We knew no more of you than that you was a Liberian: but now we commend both your actions and talent, and wish that we had many in Liberia like you, for it would be a general good.

It is a remarkable speech of Plato, "that for the trial of true virtue, tis necessary that a good man though he does no unjust thing, should suffer the infamy of the greatest injustice;"—yet at every public demonstration, he appeared anew to fill the eye of the people of Liberia with that due sense of esteem, which is the prevailing spring of the enjoyment of the entire confidence.

When the seal of State was delivered into his hands, it was needful that the ablest man should take the helm of the affairs of State, and that man could be found in the person of none more adequate to the responsibility, than the subject of this brief notice; through whom, the melancholly spirit of every Liberian was raised from deep despair, to hope; because, he was a great genius, with a sound understanding, and an illuminated imagination. O Teage! in the language of Mr. Burke, I am afraid I flatter you; I am sure I am not disposed to blame you.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JUNE 15th, 1853.

Grand Bassa.—Our readers will find in the present number of our paper, the history of the political celebration which lately took place in Grand Bassa, and it will, we are sure, be read with much interest by those of our friends, whose views are similar. It is represented, that on no former occasion, has there been so much unanimity and good feeling among the people of that county, as exists among them now. The celebration, and the good cheer on the occasion, were on the most extensive scale. Our friends had truly a goodly time.

By the "Banshee," we received many papers and several numbers of the Colonization Journal. The Journal is filled with interesting matter. We propose in our next number to make copious extracts. It seems that the friends of Liberia and colonization in the U. S. are unceasing in their efforts to forword the holy work they are engaged in. The annual meeting of the American Colonization Society, was truly an interesting one, and we gather from the interest manifested at it, by the great and noble of the land, that the cause of colonization never had more warmer advocates than now. Indeed from appearances, there is a general cry in favor of emigrants to Liberia. The subject engrossed the the attention of one branch of Congress, for several days, and State Legislatures have made enactments in favor of it.

The bark "Shirly," which sailed from this port for Baltimore 17th, March last, with a full and valuable cargo, had not arrived on the 9th of May.

The fine bark "Banshee," A. J. Wilson, master, of Baltimore, anchored in our roadstead on the 3rd, inst with 211 immigrants. The "Banshee" sailed from Baltimore and had a passage of 31 days. Of the immigrants by this vessel, 23 have been landed here—140 are destined for Grand Bassa, and 48 for Cape Palmas. We are informed, that in this company of immigrants, there are persons of intelligence and worth, who are fully alive to the importance of their position as members of a free government. It is to be hoped that the duties which will devolve on them, in assisting to promote the interests of their adopted country, will stimulate them to acts of enterprise,—that they will exert themselves to increase the agricultural resources of the country, and build for themselves an honorable reputation. Our country is rich in all the resources which gives celebrity to a nation, and it only requires a moderate outlay of funds, and a reasonable portion of enterprise and industry to develope them.

We would be glad to hear of monthly arrivals of immigrants, who would reclaim our forests from their primitive growth, and make them blossom with productions for expectation. This can and will be done. Already some thing in this way has been accomplished, and before very long, it is not too much to say, that a great deal more will be done. An industrious and enterprising population is greatly needed—and as soon as the colored people of the United States will flee from the land which gives them but a moiety of protection, and gather under the "Lone Star" it will be, comparitively speaking, but a short time before Liberia will wear a pleasant appearance, and be one of the most desirable homes.

KATE ALLIN.—By Jenny F. Fell.

But where is he the Lover,
Who shall be here to-day?

Kate Allin, she was a glorious creature, and as I sit gazing into the flickering waves of the fire light, memory is revealing in the 'store house,' of by-gone reflections, that were once the 'starbeam of all my days.' Out from the heart's deep chamber, where it has been cherished as a holy thing for long weary years, comes the remembrance of Kate Allin, as I knew her at nineteen.

It was her bridal day, and there were busy fingers making preparations for the entertainment of the expected guests. All day had the handsome figure of Kate glided softly in and out with its peculiar air of indescribable grace, and the large dark eyes were filled with an expression of tender seriousness; touchingly beautiful to behold. Taken altogether, the dark, handsome face had forgot its mirth-inspiring smile, and wore a look of strange earnestness, entirely foreign to its usual reckless gaiety.

The day was drawing to a close, everything was in readiness, and after taking a last peep into the prettily arranged, half shadowed rooms, where the sun-light was leaving his last golden gleamings, Kate drew the curtains into a more graceful droop, with a half gay, half sad smile, sprang up stairs, followed by cousin Alice and myself to don her bridal attire.

Soon the black curls were weeping over the faultless shoulders, and our fingers were rapidly threading the luxuriant mass, as we performed the office of tire women.—Ere an hour had elapsed, the little chamber contained the most radiantly beautiful being I ever beheld. A simple dress of white muslin fell in snowy folds around her graceful figure, leaving the beautiful neck and arms just discernable through the gossamer trimmings of rich blond. The raven ringlets were not flowing in their usual style, but caught away from the shoulders, and fell half shading, the face with a tiny wreath of snowberries and myrtle. After pressing a kiss of mingled love and admiration upon Kate's forehead, cousin Alice, who was to officiate as bridesmaid, tripped lightly down stairs, and soon returned with Mrs. Allin.

Oh Kate, my beautiful, so soon to leave me forever, murmured the mother, as the impulsive Kate sprang into her embrace, to the sad disarrangement of the nicely arranged hair, and Kate, my own. God bless you! and may you always be faithful to the great trust reposed in you.

Mrs. Allin did not trust herself to speak again, her last voice was unsteady, and a tear glittered on the tremulous hand that sought the door.

Kate turned to the window and stood gazing out into the deepening twilight. "Why don't he come?" she murmured more than once, and then commenced walking rapidly the floor. Again she passed before the window half started back and, then said in a low excited tone, 'Come here, girls.'

We obeyed. What a change had came over the late fair heavens. The gorgeous sun dyed and crimson clouds were fast giving place to one large dark, and murky, that came rapidly up, shadowing the beautiful landscape with its broad wings, like a bird of ill omen. And away far off in the western sky, the forked lightning flashes threw out their quivering chains and gave warning of an approaching tempest.

We stood there and gazed until the twilight faded away, and the shadows gathered thickly in the little room, that the white figure, standing so mute at the window, was barely distinguished from surrounding objects. And yet no bridegroom? Mr. Allin had joined us now: and had spoken half cheerfully of the loiterer, but Kate showed no sign of attention save a momentary trembling of the lip.

All at once a quick coming sounded of horses feet broke upon the stillness; Kate heard it, for the small hand resting upon my arm closed mine with such convulsive energy, that I utter an involuntary cry of pain. Nearer, nearer, and nearer yet came that impatient gallop; and at last a panting horse, and the outlines of the riders figure were just discernable and then plainly distinct.

Now Kate's hand left mine, and was pressed firmly down against the wildly throbbing heart. The equestrian neared the house—we saw the cap raised gallantly in acknowledgment of Kate's presence, and then—'O, heavens! what looming wonder, what a fearful flash! and ere our dazzled eyes recovered their vision the white steed dashed by the window; but oh, God! it was riderless.

POETRY

THE HAUNTS OF POESY

BY EMILY.

When angels left the earth, and man
From Eden's precints fled,
Some smiling seraph from the skies,
By gentle impulse led;
One string from his immortal lyre
In quiv'ring rapture hurl'd,
To take the form of poesy,
And echo thro' the world!
And not alone in airy realms,
'Mid glad unshadow'd scenes.
Where fancy with her golden wand,
Lights up the land of dreams;
That she, the spirit of the harp,
Spreads forth her music wings,
And warb'ling thro' the human heart
A holy influence flings—
Her mission is around the Earth,
Wherever beauty dwells;
Her wild notes sounding on the sea,
Her whispers in the dells.
She haunts the mountain's cloud-bound steep,
The cascade's silv'ry spray;
The sculptur'd arch, the ruined fane,
And hoar rocks, moss'd and grey.
She treads the solemn forest's shade,
And stirs the vine drap'd bowers;
Sings o'er the fountain in the glade
And breathes along the bowers.
And when the evening's varied hues,
Glide o'er the Western sky,
And night, with glorious bosom bare,
Lifts her proud crest on high;
In every ray the blushing moon
Drops thro'her rosy bars,
She glistens with inspiring voice,
And trembles 'round the stars!'
Like a celestial visitant,
Amid life's toil and care,
She steals across our darken'd hours,
And burns with lustre there.
Her footsteps crown the rugged heights,
With flowers sweet and fair,
The wild, the lovely, dark and bright,
Own each her presence there.
By many a lonely, humble hearth,
'Mid sadness, want and pain,
Her touch upon some gifted mind,
Has rent each gloomy chain,
And borne it thro' the mist of tears,
Onward with tireless aim
'Till genius' strugg'ling son has won
The fadeless wreath of fame!
Yet, tho' she lingers with us here,
Still, like the ocean shed,
Becalling mem'ries of the sea
With ever murmu'ring spell;
An impress in each mellow strain,
That swells with lofty tone,
Tells that bright link from glory lost,
In Heaven has her home!—Weekly Clipper.

A BIRD TWENTY FEET HIGH

Not many years ago, a sailor presented at the British Museum a huge marrowbone, which he desired to sell, and which he had brought from New Zealand. The officers of that institution referred him to the College of Surgeons, where they said he would find a gentleman, one Professor Owen, who had a remarkable predilection for old bones. Accordingly, the sailor took his treasure to the Professor; who, finding it unlike any bone even he had any knowledge of, sent the man away rejoicing—rejoicing himself in the acquisition of a new subject for scientific inquiry. Although the bone had manifestly, contained marrow, and was, therefore, unlike the bones of birds in general, Mr. Owen concluded, from certain structural evidences, that this bone had belonged to a bird, and a bird of a species hitherto unknown. It was immediately figured and lithographed, and copies, with certain instructions for finding other such bones were sent out to New Zealand, to be distributed wherever Europeans had trod among the ferns of that colony. Years passed. By and by a very big box arrived in Lincoln's Inn fields, London, containing congeners of the sailor's marrowbone; some of them upwards of a yard long. Professor Owen set to work, and built up from these bones, not one, but five (ultimately eleven) distinct species of an extinct animal, hitherto utterly unknown to natural history. It must have been unable to fly, (hence the marrow, instead of air, in the bones,) and must have had uncommon pedestrian powers (hence the necessity for marrow.) The structure of the beak and neck indicates that its power of wrenching and grubbing up roots must have been tremendous. Its food was fern roots, which, in New Zealand, are so farinaceous that the natives make bread of them to this day. It has been named the dinornis, because it is the most stupendous of birds (deinos, fearfully great, oenis, bird.) The disappearance of the dinornis is easily accounted for. When the progenitors of the present native tribes first landed from the South Seas, the dinornis must have been their only animal food, for in New Zealand no quadrupeds are indigenous. As it took no longer than a century for the Dutch to extirpate the dodo from the Mauritius, a couple of centuries would have quite sufficed to kill and cook the dinornis off the face of New Zealand. When these birds had been all eaten up, the Maoris took to killing and cooking one another. The next great zoological excitement to be looked for is a real, live dinornis. If one of these gigantic birds be ever found and brought to the Regent's Park, the hippopotamus may accept the Chiltern Hundreds, and retire from the representation of the Nile, disgusted at the lead that will be taken by the honorable member from New Zealand.—The Southern Baptist.

What they do at the top of the earth.

Thirteen thousand seven hundred and twenty feet above the level of the sea. At a perpendicular elevation of upwards of two miles and a half, nearly on the snow line of the Andes, stands the topmost city of the earth, Ceno de Pasco. It is the capital of the richest silver district in Peru. In the shops of Pasco are found the products of all countries. Bass's pale ale is in high favor here, and knives and forks carry the stamp of Sheffield cutlers. I remember being pleasantly surprised in a shepherd's hut on the Puna, at having placed before me some boiled maize on a plate ornamented with a picture of John Anderson My Joe and his gude wife, with two verses of the song beneath it. The Indian was delighted at the pleasure I took in the plate, and was solicitous to have the lines translated. The taste for gambling, so prevalent throughout South America is most strongly developed at Ceno de Pasco. Public lotteries are drawn every week, and sometimes every day in the week. The streets are continually infested by fellows crying, "A thousand dollars to morrow." These men carry books, from which they tear, for each customer, a ticket, price one shilling, giving him or her a chance in the next lottery. The prize is sometimes as large as five thousand dollars, with intermediate ones of smaller amount. I believe that the strictest impartiality and fairness characterise the drawing. All these lotteries are under Government control. The billiard and montero tables are in constant request; dominoes is a favorite game in the cafes, but those games at cards which are rapid in their results and depend wholly upon chance, have irresistible attractions for all classes. The shaven priest, decorated with cross and rosary, may be frequently seen playing with the ragged Indian, and instances are told of the wealthy mine proprietor losing in a night, every dollar he possessed, to one of his own ragged men. The cockpit is a favorite amusement. The combatants are armed with one spur only; this is a flat, curved, two-edged blade, very keen and finely pointed. The first blow commonly decides the battle, and both cocks are often killed. Hundreds of dollars change hands every minute; the excitement of the betters is intense, and even here on the afternoon of the Sabbath, which is especially appropriated to the cock fight, the priest hands round the begging box, or lays his dollar on a favorite bird.—Evening Chronicle.

Contemplated Invasion of England by France.

The apprehension of this invasion may seem chimerical, because of its apparent impracticability, but the late Duke of Wellington died in the conviction that it would be attempted. England is bestirring herself vigorously, and sparing no effort in the way of preparation for the coming shock. Indeed, since beginning this letter, a gentleman just arrived from the other side of the Channel has told me that, so soon as the President's Bordeaux speech, in which the speaker said, "The empire is peace!" was reported, there, every dockyard man was set to work, and every ship out of commission was overhauled. And well does it behoove the great rival of France to be up and active, if she would successfully meet the onset of such a well-ordered host as is now escorting Louis Napoleon to the palace of the Tuileries. The sight of it filled my soul with sadness, when I reflected that such a magnificent array, capable of so much mischief, was eager to obey the caprice or passion of one whose whole life has proved that he neither fears God nor regards man.

It is thought that an army ninety thousand strong, thrown simultaneously on the shores of England and Ireland, would furnish ample employment for all the regulars not exceeding thirty thousand, which Great Britain has in hand, although they should be backed by as many irregulars as could be mustered. And even on the supposition that one third of the French armament, with a proportionate quantity of shipping carrying it, were to be destroyed, still it is calculated that enough will remain to turn the least glimmering of fortune to a good account.

Now, should a war arise between the two great maritime powers of Europe, if America could keep clear of it, her profits by the carrying trade would be almost incalculable. But what chance is there of her being able to remain neutral amid innumerable seizures of her merchant ships in consequence of "orders in council" and "Imperial decrees?" Before six months had elapsed, she would find herself involved as a party to the strife. Then, does it not become our men in authority to spare time enough from their party politics to examine the means at our disposal against such a contingency? Is it not their duty to make more efficient provisions than those in existence for encountering the perilous trial.—The Southern Baptist.

Liberian Independence.

A proposition was made in the U. S. Senate, just before the close of the late session, for a recognition of the independence of the Republic of Liberia. Two or three speeches were made in its favor, on the ground of justice; two or three against it, on the ground of inexpediency Nothing was done.

Liberia has now a population as large as that of California or Texas. It has a coast extending as far as from Boston to Charleston. It has a growing commerce in sugar, palm oil, and other tropical productions. It has a well disciplined militia and a thorough system of schools. It has a fair amount of manufacturing and business enterprise. It has a republican constitution similar to that of our own State. It has an efficient government of elective officers. England, France and Prussia have each acknowledged its independence, and given it their encouragement. But the United States refuse theirs.

We are fond of telling the world that Liberia is a great Christian work of ours,—that it is our desire to emancipate the African race, and elevate them in their native country. Our slaveholders are fond of remarking that, in this way, Slavery is, in the end, to be productive of much good. Of course the world believes it The action of our Government shows how sincere we are—our acts are the commentary on our words.

The reputation of America, it is said, has suffered abroad, in consequence of the spread of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Time might dispel the effects of the fiction, if we did not take care to supply a corollary of facts every now and then, to confirm it. We are ready enough to "get rid of the free colored people," but we hesitate when anything comes up that evinces a disposition to get rid of the Slaves. An acknowledgement of Liberian independence might imply a censure upon the doctrine that the true and natural condition of black men is to be dependent upon white ones.

Well, let Liberia stand aside a while and wait. It can do without our recognition; so long as it is at peace and in favor with the rest of the world. It will continue to thrive, notwithstanding. But there is one aspect in which it is worth considering. Acknowledge it or not, Liberia is there. There it is, growing and prospering. There it is—giving us the lie whenever we talk about the "incapability of the blacks to take care of themselves," and their "unfitness for votes or work or government." There it is—beyond the power of even the Congress of the United States to alter. Day by day it is building up a monument to Slavery. Every year it develops what Colonization is, and when it is going to be, what we support it for, and just how far we are honest in our professions of admiration of it.—Frederick Douglass' Paper.

THE DANCING DERVISHES.

Madame Ida Pfeiffer, in her journal of travels to the Holy Land, gives the following sketches:

THE DANCING DERVISHES.

I arrived at Constantinople on Tuesday, and immediately inquired what was worth seeing. I was advised to go and see the dancing dervishes, as this was the day on which they held their religious exercises in Pera.

I had only stood a few moments, when the Sultan appeared on horseback, surrounded by his train. He alone rode into the courtyard; the others all dismounted at the gate, and entered on foot. The horse on which the Sultan rode was of rare beauty, and, as they told me, of the true Arabian breed; the saddle-cloth was richly embroidered with gold, and the stirrups, of the same precious metal, were in the form of shoes, covered with the finest chased work.

The Sultan is a slender, slim-looking youth of nineteen years of age, and looks pale languid and blase. His features are agreeable, and his eyes fine. If he had not abandoned himself at so early an age to all the pleasures of the senses, he would, no doubt, have grown a stalwart man. He wore a long cape of dark blue cloth; and a high fez cap, with a heron's plume and a diamond clasp, decked his head. The greeting of the people, and the Sultan's mode of acknowledging it, is exactly as at Vienna, except that here the people at intervals raise a low cry of welcome.

As soon as the Sultan had entered the temple, all flocked in. The men and the Franks (the latter without distinction of sex) sit or stand in the body of the temple. The Turkish woman sit in galleries, behind such close wire gratings that they are completely hidden. The temple, or more properly the hall, is of inconsiderable size, and the spectators are only separated from the priests by a low railing.

At two o'clock the dervishes appeared, clad in long petticoats with innumerable folds, which reached to their heels. Their heads were covered with high pointed caps of white felt. They spread out carpets and skins of beasts, and began their ceremonies with a great bowing and kissing of the ground. At length the music struck up; but I do not remember ever to have heard a performance so utterly horrible. The instruments were a child's drum, a shepard's, pipe, and a miserable fiddle. Several voices set up a squeaking and whining accompaniment, with an utter disregard of time and tune.

Twelve dervishes now began their dance, if indeed a turning round in a circle, while their full dresses spread round them like a large wheel, can be called by such a name. They display much address in avoiding each other, and never come in contact, though their stage is very small. I did not notice any "convulsions," of which I had read in many descriptions.

THE HOWLING DERVISHES.

At two o'clock we entered the temple, a miserable wooden building. Every Mussulman may take part in this religious ceremony—it is not requisite that he should have attained to the rank and dignity of a dervish. Even children of eight or nine stood up in a row, outside the circle of men, to gain an early proficiency in these holy exercises.

The commencement of the ceremony is the same as with the dancing dervishes; they have spread out carpets and skins of beasts, and fall bowing and kissing the ground. Now they stand up and form a circle together with the laymen, when the chief begins in a yelling voice to recite prayers from the Koran; by degrees, those forming the circle join in, and scream in concert. For the first hour, some degree of order is still preserved; the performers rest frequently to husband their strength, which will be exerted to the utmost at the close of the ceremony. But then the sight becomes as horrible as one can well imagine any thing. They vie with one another, in yelling and howling, and torture their faces, heads and bodies, into an infinite variety of fantastic attitudes. The roaring, which resembles that of wild beasts, and the horrible spasmodic contortions of the actors' countenances, render this religious ceremony a horrible and revolting spectacle.

The men stamp with their feet on the ground, jerk their heads backwards and forwards, and certainly throw themselves into worse contortions than those who are described as having been in old times "vexed with a devil." During the exercises they snatch the covering from their heads, and gradually take off all their clothes, with the exception of shirt and trousers. The two high priests, who stand within the circle, receive the garments one after another, kiss them, and leave them on a heap together. The priests beat time with their hands, and after the garments have been laid aside the dance becomes faster and faster. Heavy drops of perspiration stand on every brow; some are even foaming at the mouth. The howling and roaring at length reach such a dreadful pitch that the spectator feels stunned and bewildered.

Suddenly one of these maniacs fell lifeless to the ground. The priests and a few from the circle hurried towards him, stretched him out flat, crossed his hands and feet, and covered him with a cloth.

The doctor and I were both considerably alarmed, for we thought the poor man had been seized with apoplexy. To our surprise and joy, however, we saw him, about six or eight minutes afterwards, suddenly throw off the cloth, jump up, and once more take his place in the circle to howl like a maniac.

At three o'clock the ceremony concluded. I would not advise any person afflicted with weak nerves to witness it, for he certainly could not endure the sight. I could have fancied myself among raving lunatics and men possessed, rather than amidst reasonable beings. It was long before I could recover my composure, and realize the idea that the infatuation of a man could attain such a pitch. I was informed that before the ceremony they swallow opium, to increase the wildness of their example.*

LIBERIA HERALD

Address of the Hon Edward Everett.

AT THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN COL. SOCIETY, 18th JANUARY 1853

Mr. President and Gent. of the Col. Socity:—

It was my intention when I was requested some weeks ago, to take a part in the proceedings of this evening, to give to the subject of the Colonization Society and its operations on the coast of Africa, the most thorough examination in my power, in all its bearings, considering that, whether we look to the condition of this country or the interests of Africa, no more important object could engage our attention. But during almost the whole of the interval that has since elapsed, my time and my thoughts have been so entirely taken up and pre-occupied, that it has been altogether out of my power to give more than the hastiest preparation to the part which I am to take in this evening's proceedings. I am therefore obliged to throw myself upon the indulgence of this audience, with such a hasty view of the subject as I have been alone able to take

The Colonization Society seems to me to have been the subject of much unmerited odium, of much equally unmerited indifference on the part of the great mass of the community, and to have received that attention which it so well deserves, from but very few. We regard it now only in its infancy. All that we see in this country is the quiet operation of a private association, pursuing the even tenor of its way without ostentation, without eclat; and on the coast of Africa there is nothing to attract our attention but a small settlement, the germ of a Republic which, however prosperous, is but still in its infancy,

But before we decide even these small beginnings—before we make up our minds that the most important futurities are not wrapped up in them, even as the spreading oak is wrapped up in the small acorn which we can hold in our fingers, we should do well to recollect the first twenty-five or thirty years of the settlement at Jamestown, in your State, Mr. President, the parent of Virginia. We should do well to remember the history of that dreadful winter at Plymouth, when more than half of the Mayflower's little company were laid beneath the sod, and that sod smoothed over for fear the native savage would come and count the number of the graves. I think if you look to what has been done in Liberia in the last quarter of a century, you will find that it compares favorably with the most and the best that was done in Virginia or in Plymouth, during the same period. These seem to me to be reasons why we should not look with too much distrust at the small beginnings that have been made.

Gentlemen, the foundation of this Society was laid in a great political and moral necessity. The measures which were taken for the suppressions of the slave trade naturally led to the capture of slave-ships, and the question immediately arose what should be done with the victims that were rescued from them. It was necessary that they should be returned to Africa. They could not, each and all be sent to their native villages. They had been collected from the whole interior of that country, many of them 2,000 miles in the interior, and it was out of the question that they should, immediately be sent to their homes. If they had been placed upon the coast, in a body, at any of the usual points of resort, the result would have been to throw them at once back again into the grasp of the native chiefs who are the principal agents of the slave trade. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary, if the course of measures undertaken for the suppression of the slave trade was to be pursued, that some Colony should be founded, under the name and influence and patronage of a powerful European or American State, where these poor victims should be placed at once, safely protected, supplied with necessary provisions of all kinds, civilized if possible, and by degrees enabled to find their way back to their native villages, which some of them no doubt, both from the English and American Colony have from time to time done; as we know in fact that they have.

This as I understand it, was one of the first ideas that gave origin to this Society, and as I said before, it was a political and moral necessity. Then came the kindred object, which was more important because applicable to a much larger number of persons, of providing a suitable home for that portion of the free colored population of this country that were desirous of emigrating to the land of their fathers. This at first, as I understand, for it was before my day, was an object that approved itself almost universally throughout the country; to the South as well as to the North to the white as well as to the colored population. Every body seemed to think at first that this was a practicable, desirable, and most praiseworthy object. By degrees, I am sorry to say, jealousies crept in, prejudices for so I must account them, arose; and in process of time, it has come to pass that this Society has become, I must say, intensely unpopular with a large class of the colored population whose interests and welfare were some of the prime objects of its foundation.

I will not undertake on this occasion to discuss the foundation of these prejudices. I will not dwell upon those, as they are called, oppressive laws, and that still more oppressive public sentiment in all parts of the country, which render the condition of the colored population in every part of the Union one of disability, discouragement, and hardship. In order to meet the objection to the operation of the Society which arises from the statement that it tends to co-operate with, and to strengthen these oppressive laws and this oppressive public sentiment, I will for argument sake, take it for granted that this legislation and this sentiment are correctly thus characterized; that they are as oppressive, cruel, and tyrannical as they are declared to be

Taking this for granted, I ask in the name of common sense, in the name of humanity, does this state of things furnish any reason why the free colored population of the country, should be discouraged from leaving a state of things like this, and going to the land of their fathers, a continent of their own where no such legislation, where no such unfriendly public sentiment would exist; a great and fertile land, a land that is inviting them to come and take possession of it; and in various parts of which there is everything that can attract, and reward the industry of man? It seems to me that the objection which is urged to the Society, that it co-operates with that oppressive state of things here, furnishes the very strongest reason in favor of the emigration. Let us take a parallel case. Suppose any one had gone among that little company of persecuted christians in England, in the year 1608, who afterwards became the pilgrim church of Mr. Robinson at Leyden; or suppose any one had gone in 1639 to the more important company of Gov. Winthrop the great founder of Massachusetts; had tried to excite their feelings against the projected emigration had told them that England belonged to them as much as it did to their oppressors, had led them to stand upon their rights, and if necessary bleed and die for them; had depicted the hardships and sufferings of the passage, had painted in the darkest colors, the terrors of the wilderness into which they were about to venture; would that have been true friendship, would it have been kindness, would it have been humanity? Or to come nearer home, suppose at the present day one should go into Ireland, or France, or Switzerland, or Germany, or Norway, or any of the countries from which hundreds of thousands of men, in a depressed, destitute and unhappy condition, are emigrating to the United States, to find a refuge, a home, a social position, and employment—suppose some one should go to them and try to stimulate a morbid patriotism, a bitter nationality, telling them the country where they were born, belonged as much to them as to the more favored classes, inducing them to stay where they were born, telling them that it was doubtful whether they would get employment in the new country, talking of the expenses, the discomforts, the hardships of the poor emigrant, and in this way endeavor to deter them from this great adventure, which is to end in procuring a home and a position in the world, and an education for themselves and their children, would this be friendship, would this be kindness, would this be humanity? But these are the appeals which are made to the free colored population of this country, and it is by appeals like this that the Society and the colony have become; as I am sorry to say I believe is the case, highly unpopular among them

But I must hasten on from this object of providing a home for the free colored population who wish to emigrate, to another which was a very considerable and leading object with the founders of this Society and that is the suppression of the foreign slave trade. It is grievous to reflect, it is one of the darkest things that we read of in history, that contemporaneously with the discovery of this continent, and mainly from mistaken humanity towards its natives, the whole western coast of Africa was thrown open to that desolating traffic, which from time immemorial had been carried on from the ports of the Mediterranean, the Nile, and the Red Sea, and the shores of Eastern Africa.—It is still more painful to reflect that it was precisely at the period when the best culture of modern Europe was moving rapidly towards its perfection, that the intercourse of Africa with Europe, instead of proving a blessing proved a curse. Have you well considered, Mr. President, that it was in the days of Shakespeare, and Spenser, and Hooker, and Bacon, and other bright suns in the firmament of the glory of England, that her navigators first began to go forth, and as if in derision, in vessels, bearing the venerable names of "the Solomon" and "the Jesus," to the coast of Africa to tear away its wretched natives into a state of bondage. It was at the very time when in England and France, the last vestiges of the feudal system were breaking down, when private war was put an end to, and men began to venture out from the walled towns and dwell in safety in the open country, and to traverse the high roads without fear, it was then that these most polished nations began to enter into competition with each other, which should monopolize the cruel traffic, the African slave trade, the principal agency of which was to stir up a system of universal hostility; not merely between nation and nation, but between tribe and tribe, clan and clan family and family, and often between members of the same household; for, I am sorry to say it is no unprecedented thing for these poor creatures to sell their wives and children to the slave trader.

In this way the whole western coast of Africa became like the Northern and Eastern coast before, one general mart for the slave trade. This lasted for three hundred years. At length the public sentiment of the world, in Europe and America, was awakened Several of the colonial assemblies in this country passed acts inhibiting the slave trade, but they were uniformly negatived by the Crown. The Continental Congress in 1776, denounced the traffic. The federal convention in 1789 fixed a prospective period for its abolition in this country. The examples was followed by the States of Europe. At the present day every christian and several of the Mahommedan powers have forbidden it; yet it is extensively carried on, and some authorities say that the number of slaves taken from Africa has not materially diminished; but I hope this is not true. This state of facts has led several persons most desirous of putting an end to the traffic, to devise some new system, some new agency; and all agree—there is not a dissenting voice on that point—that the most effectual, and in fact the only substitute is the establishment of colonies. Wherever a colny is established on the coast of Africa under the direction of a christian power in Europe or America, there the slave trade disappears; not merely from the coast of the colony, but from the whole interior of the country which found access at any point on that coast. In this way, from the most northern extremity of the French and English colonies down to the most southern limit of the American settlements, the slave trade has entirely disappeared. The last slave mart in that region, the Gallinas, has within a short time, I believe, come within the jurisdiction of the American colony of Liberia. Now, along that whole line of coast and throughout the whole interior connected with it, a line of coast, as I believe, not less than that from Maine to Georgia—from every port and every harbor of which the foreign slave trade was carried on—within the memory of man, it has entirely disappeared. What Congresses of sovereigns at Vienna, and Aixla-Chapelle, could not do, what squadrons of war steamers cruising along the coast could not achieve, what quintuple treaties among the powers of Europe could not effect by the arts of diplomacy, has been done by these poor little colonies, one of which at least, that of Liberia, has, in latter times, been almost without the recognition of this government, struggling into permanence by the resources furnished by private benevolence. (Applause.) I ask what earthly object of this kind more meritorious than this can be named? And what career is there opened to any colored man in Europe or America, more praiseworthy, more inviting than this, to form as it were, in his own person a portion of that living cordon, stretching along the coast and barring its whole extent from the approaches of this traffic? (Applause.)

But even the suppression of the slave trade, all important as it is, is but auxiliary to another ulterior object of still more commanding importance, and that is the civilization of Africa. The condition of Africa is a disgrace to the rest of the civilized world. With an extent nearly three times as great as that of Europe, its known portions of great fertility, teeming with animal and vegetable life; traversed by magnificent chains of mountains, East, and West, North and South, whose slopes send down the tributaries of some of the noblest rivers in the world, connecting on the North by the Mediterranean, with the ancient and modern culture of Europe, projecting on the West far into the Atlantic ocean, that great highway of the world's civilization, running on the South East into a near proximity to our own South American continent, open on the East to the trade of India: and on the North East by the Red Sea and the Nile, locked closely into the Asiatic continent, one would have thought that with all these natural endowments, with this noble geographical position, Africa was destined to be the emporium, the garden of the Globe Man alone in this unhappy continent, has dropped so far into arrears in the great march of humanity, behind the other portions of the human family, that the question has at length been started whether he does not labor under some incurable, natural inferiority. In this, for myself, I have no belief whatever.

I do not deny that among the numerous races in the African continent, as among the numerous races in all the other continents, there are great diversities, from the politic and warlike tribes upon the central plateau, to the broken down hordes on the slave coast, and on the banks of the Congo, and the squalid, half human Hottentot. But do you think the difference is any greater between them than it is between the Laplander, the Gipsy, the Calmuc, and the proudest and brightest specimens of humanity in Europe or America? I think not.

What then can be the cause of the continued uncivilization of Africa? Without attempting presumptuously to pry into the mysteries of Providence, I think that adequate causes can be found in some historical and geographical circumstances. It seems a law of human progress, which hower difficult to explain, is too well sustained by facts to be doubted, that in the first place advances out of barbarism into civilization, the first impulses and guidances must come from abroad. This of course leaves untouched the great mystery who could have made a beginning; but still as far back as history or tradition runs, we do find that the first guidance and impulse came from abroad. From Egypt and Syria the germs of improvement were brought to Greece, from Greece to Rome, from Rome to the North and West of Europe, from Europe to America, and they are now speeding on from us to the farthest West, until at length it shall meet the East again. To what extent the aboriginal element shall be borne down and overpowered by the foreign influences, or enter into kindly combination with them, depends upon the moral and intellectual development of both parties. There may be such aptitude for improvement, or the disparity between the native and foreign race may be so small, that a kindly combination will at once take place. This is supposed to have been the case with the ancient Grecian tribes in reference to the emigrants from Egypt and the East. Or the inaptitude may be so great, and the disparity between the natives and the foreigners may be so wide that no such kindly union can take place. This is commonly supposed to be the case with the natives of our own continent, who are slowly and silently retiring before the inroads of a foreign influence.

Now in reference to this law of social progress, there have been in Africa two most unfortunate difficulties. In the first place, all the other branches of the human family that have had the start of Africa in civilization have, from the very dawn of history, been concerned in the slave trade, so that intercourse with foreigners instead of being a source of mutual improvement to both parties, particularly to the weaker, has, in the case of Africa, only tended to sink them deeper into barbarism and degeneracy of every kind. This has been one difficulty. Another is the climate—this vast equatorial expanse—aggregate of land between the tropics, greater than all the other parts of the globe together, her fervid vertical sun, burning down upon the rank vegetation of her fertile plains, and rendering her shores and water courses pestiferous to a foreign constitution. This circumstance also seems to shut Africa out from the approaches of civilization through the usual channels The ordinary inducements of gain, are too weak to tempt the merchant to those feverous shores. Nothing but a taste for adventure, approaching to mania, attracts the traveller; and when christian benevolence allures the devoted missionary to this field of labor, it lures him too often to his doom.'

A Discourse on African Colonization by the Rev. William Henry Ruffner of Philadelphia

Every such colony still exists, and wherever its jurisdiction extends, has banished piracy and the slave trade, established constitutional civil government, trial by jury, and the reign of laws introduced the usage and comforts of civilized life, and imparted them to many of the nations, established schools, built houses of worship, gathered churches, and maintained the preaching of the Gospel, protected missionaries and seen native converts received into Christian communion. Not a colony has been attempted without leading to these results. Take the three colonies of Cape Palmas, (the Maryland colony,) Liberia proper, and Sierra Leone, the British colony, (formed of slaves who fled to the British during our Revolutionary war,) and within their bounds you find considerably upwards of 100 missionaries and assistant missionaries, many of them of African descent, and some of them native Africans, now successfully laboring in the regeneration of Africa; and we see as the true fruit of their labors something like 15,000 regular communicants in Christian churches, a much larger number regular attendants upon the preaching of the Gospel, and many tens of thousands of natives perfectly accessible to Christian influences. All this has been done since the settlement of Sierra Leone in 1787, and most of it since the settlement of Liberia in 1822 The results of the other system after a trial of more than 300 years, are certainly very small, although we have not the exact statistics. Whatever general views we have as to the best mode of conducting Christian missions, and whatever view we may take of colonization in other aspects, one practical conclusion of incalculable value has undoubtedly been reached, viz: that the establishment and sustenance of colonies of Christian men of color in the country is the best, if not the only practicable mode of advancing the civilization and christianization of Africa. In fact, something akin to this is the ultimate hope of all foreign missions. It is not expected that missionaries will ever directly Christianize any country. Their aim is to form Christian nuclei in the shape of little native communities, whose influence will be the means of enlightening and converting the rest. African colonization differs from this in only one respect, which gives a great advantage. Instead of awaiting the slow process of teaching and elevating a portion of the savage nations, in order that they may become teachers and civilizers of others, colonization begins where the missionary leaves off, with a christianized community, not strictly of natives, but of people of the same race, who will naturally exert as potent and favorable an influence on their African brethren as if they were all born on the soil, There are some pregnant indications in recent evolutions of the providence of God, which seem to indicate that the efficatious principle of colonization is to be largely applied in the world's conversion. California and Australia, as well as Liberia, are just now fields in which these remarkable indications are displayed, Had the discoveries of gold in these countries been made in the last century, no such sensations could have agitated the world as is now agitating it. Nations were then too isolated, and ignorant of each other. No such commingling of races and nations could then have taken place as we now behold in the gold regions; and more than this, the countries containing the hidden treasure were not then in possession of truly Christian governments. These two great centres of attraction lying on opposite sides of the globe, are drawing together great numbers of people from a variety of lands, civilized and uncivilized, where they are destined to come under Christian influences. The design of Providence is not yet sufficiently manifest, for us to say how far these remarkable movements are destined to contribute to the ends under consideration, but that they will be powerfully effective, none can doubt; and mark you, so far as they are effective, it will be by the return of Christianized Pagans to their own countries.

"These discoveries of hid treasures are not yet ended. I feel prepared to huzzard the opinion that the progress of African Colonization is to be vastly accelerated by discoveries which shall appeal to the same acquisitive passion which is so rapidly peopling California and Australia. It was meet that the first founders of the Liberian nation should be men who were actuated by nobler motives than those appealing to their cupidity. Like the Puritans of New England, the pioneers of Liberian greatness were men of high principle, who sought a free home; and like the Puritans, they laid the foundations of their government in solid strength. But the high motives which influenced the majority of the Liberian settlers are not such as influence the majority of men. Now that the community is established in all its essential elements of prosperity, it is prepared to receive those who can be attracted only by inducements inferior to those which attracted the original settlers. Multitudes will be moved by the love of money, who will not be moved by the desire for freedom, social equality, and high moral elevation. Liberia now appeals to the latter motive, and to some extent to the former. Certainly the offerings of fortune are now much more promising to the colored man now in Liberia, than in in any other portion of the world; and already have we had intimations that somewhere within that region there are to be laid open sources of wealth as tempting as those of California. Undoubtedly vast deposits of gold lie imbedded in Western Africa; and when exposed, hey will be (in a manner) exclusively for the colored man. Even Aglo-Saxon enterprise must succumb before the pestilential air of Africa. What use God means to make of the Gold of Africa in the furtherance of his cause on earth, no man knoweth; but supposing the news come to America, that on the western coast of Africa mines of gold, richer than those of California, have been discovered, how quickly would be dissipated the fierce opposition of the masses of our free colored people to African Colonization. Thousands who are incapable of being influenced by higher motives, would hasten to the diggings as fast as sails and steam could carry them; and this influence would be permanent. Suddenly a great Christian nation of colored people would appear on the coast, and out of this, perhaps venial cupidity, would grow the most blessed results to that benighted continent. Let those who are skeptical as to the practicability of ever removing large numbers of the colored population from this country to Africa, consider, in the light of European immigration to the United States and the mighty rush of people to Australia and California, how easily similar motives would empty this land of the free colored population. And wherever the colored man goes from America, he will be accompanied, in some form or other, by a pure Christianity and to a great extent by its resulting civilization As long as America remains enlightened and civilized, she will not permit the colored colonists, who have gone out from her bosom, to sink far below the level of her own attainments. I have great faith in the self-sustaining powers of the improved colored race, but however faithless one may be as to this point, who can suppose the people of the United States to be so recreant to the peculiar relations they sustain to the race, as ever to withdraw their fostering care, or even to fail in affording the most liberal encouragement to all communities formed on the coast of Africa by colored men who have gone out from this country; and who could imagine any thing but the most active possible co-operation of the Christian public, in elevating and saving the whole native population! We are the providentially designated guardians of Africa; and as soon might we expect the conscientious parent to see ignorance, degradation, and ruin fasten upon his son without using every effort to save him, as to see America allow the decadence of Liberia, as long as it was possible to save her. However strangely the words of Pitt may have sounded in the British Parliament, forty years ago, they now seem only the language of obvious truth. "We may live, (said he) to behold the natives of Africa engaged in the calm occupations of industry, and pursuits of just and legitimate commerce. We may behold the beams of science and philosophy breaking in upon that land, which in some happy period, at still later times, may blaze with their full lustre, and joining their influence to that of pure religion, may illuminate and invigorate the most distant extremities of that vast continent.'"

"Liberia is exerting upon Africa an influence somewhat similar to that exerted by this country on Europe, yet much greater in proportion; and vast good is done by special missionary effort. There are a large number of native children in the schools, where they commonly evince quickness of mind and a desire to learn. Already a large number of natives have learned to speak the English language, are regular attendants upon church and many of them are hopeful converts to the Christian religion. The rights of citizenship are extended to all native Africans residing within the limits of the Republic, as soon as they manifest sufficient interest and intelligence: and already several of them are justices of the peace. And it is a very interesting fact, that the entire Baptist mission is under the exclusive direction of native converts. There are always native boys anxious to be taken into Liberian families as servants, in order that they may have an opportunity of acquiring an English education. A number of African kings have sent their sons from several hundred miles in the interior to be placed in the families of colonists These return to their homes imbued with new and noble ideas of life and religion. And the interchange of commodities is a powerful incidental means of enlightenment; and these effects will continue to multiply in an increasing ratio. President Roberts states, that in a tour which he made some years ago, extending about three hundred miles inland, he found manifest traces of Liberian influence extending through the entire distance. There were persons in every place where he stopped who could speak the English language. The chiefs of the tribes, through which he passed, evinced the utmost eagerness to have schools established among them, offering to erect buildings and support institutions, where their children might be taught the arts of civilization and the truths of the Christian religion. Some of the native settlements in Liberia, composed of recaptured slaves from the slave ships, have been wonderfully assimilated to those of the citizens; and in various seasons of revival, large numbers of natives have been subjects, of grace. I am satisfied, after pretty extensive reading upon the subject, that such an eagerness to learn, and such a sincere readiness to embrace Christianity has not been evinced by any other heathen people since the era of modern missions. It is amazing that the Christian world has been so feebly impressed by the remarkable reception which Christianity has met with in Western Africa. Consider the stolid indifference of the American Indians, the supercilious contempt of the Chinese, the firm bigotry of the people of India and Hindoostan, the bloody rage of the South Sea Islanders, and the various forms of opposition met with in most other portions of the heathen world, and contrast them with the eager, grateful, beseeching attitude of the Africans, and you cannot fail to receive the impression that there the Gospel of Christ is destined to achieve its speediest and most remarkable triumphs. It would indeed seem that the Spirit of God had rode on the crest of the wave of immigration, and had swept away before the advancing tide every barrier of opposition which sin had erected against the truth of the Son of God. If American Christians heed not these wonderful beckonings of Providence, if they sustain not this Christian enterprise with a vigour and liberality corresponding to this crying demand for the Gospel, surely the curse of Meroz will rest upon their souls. Brethren, brethren, from the dark shades of Africa, ten thousand heathen voices come to our ears in sad and sorrowing tones, wailing our their griefs, and praying us for light and life, through Jesus Christ. Let the pathetic sound thrill and melt our hearts; and soon let the breezes which sweep from the sea through her scented groves bear our gladdening response. It is God's Spirit that has aroused them to a sense of their woes, and turned their hearts unto the Saviour of all men. He has answered almost before we called. Let the Christians of this land come up to the help of the Lord, and soon those mango groves will resound with hymns to Christ, soon the light of life flashing free throughout that land will wake into life a multitude of Christian nations; and the descending sun of Africa will look, not upon senseless mirth and revelry, but upon the ascending incense of thankful worship, and upon all the tokens of a happy, thriving, and elevated population."

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, JULY 20th, 1853.

We noticed in the "Illustrated London News" that Her Britannic Majesty's Government have appointed a Consular Agent to Sherbro Castle. We also learn that Her Majesty's Government intend to make several appointments of this character to the West Coast of Africa—the ostensible object of which is, to put an end to the slave trade. It has been ascertained that most all of the chieftains, with whom Her Majesty's Government, have entered into treaty stipulations, for the abolition of the slave trade, still clandestinely carry on the abominable traffic, and it is supposed that Consular Agents residing near the capital of powerful kings may exercise an influence, which soon may eradicate this pestilence from the African Coast

A Mr. Cambell, long a resident at Sierra Leone, has been appointed British Consul at Lagos. he passed here on his way to his post a few days ago, in the Mail steamer "Forerunner"

The City Authorities have entered into arrangements with a person, we believe competent for the undertaking, to keep the streets clear of weeds and other noxious growth. We sincerely hope that this matter will be strictly attended to, and thereby cause our city to present a more pleasing aspect. The officers of the town should be made to do their duty, and be responsible for the collection of the taxes. It is but a small amount that is required of each male adult, and it should without the least delay be collected.

Very Strange. A Spanish vessel, polacca rigged, came in here in the latter part of April last, offering for sale, brandies, wines, & potatoes, what amount of sales she made, we know not. Previously, she had stopped at the Nunez, Pongas, Gambia and Sierra Leone. We beleived the vessel to be engaged in legitimate trade—but lately it has been ascertained that the fellow had been hoodwinking her Majesty's cruisers—several of whom had boarded, & examined her—and the Liberian authorities. A few days ago, Boyer of Trade Town sent an express, to the Government giving the true character of this vessel. She is a slave trader in disguise, and actually landed to Boyer a lot of goods, and a round sum in doubloons to be paid for in slaves. Boyer did not hesitate to receive the doubloons and merchandize, but determined not to make any payment for them. As we before said he despatched an express to the Government & in the interim consulted with his advisers as to the policy of seizing the Captain of the slaver and sending him here. The fishmen heard of Boyer's intention & communicated it to the Captain of the slaver, who immediately decamped. The "Lark" and a cutter employed for the purpose were sent in search of him. Her Majesty's steam sloop "Pluto" is also on the watch after him.

The last annual meeting of the American Colonization Society, was very interesting. The attendance from all parts of the Union was much larger than usual. Many of the distinguished Statesmen of that great country, were present, and eloquently advocated the claims of the Society. If what we gather from American papers be taken as evidence, the cause of African Colonization has obtained a popularity among the American people that no other benevolent institution has ever attained; and is it saying too much, when we assert, that the scheme of American Colonization to Africa is the most prominent and effectual plan for the benefit of the African race, than any we have ever heard brought to the notice of the civilized world. The colored man is brought from the grinding yoke of oppression and transplanted in the land of his Fathers. Here he stands "erect, self-poised, and none dare to make him afraid." He is recognized as a man, and if he will exert himself, and try to understand his position and responsibilities as a free and independent citizen of a free and independent Republic, he may gratify his ambition by obtaining the highest honors in the State, if he gains the confidence of his fellow citizens. He is governed by laws, which he assists in making. If he appreciates his condition, he is bound to raise himself, and the State which heartily welcomes him. There is no aristocracy in Liberia, but what industry and intelligence recognize, and those who do not possess sufficient pride and patriotism to raise themselves in the scale of intellectual worth, must be contented, even in Liberia, to occupy subordinate positions. The American Colonization Society is a praise worthy institution—its name is already immortalized. It has planted on a savage coast, tho' having to surmount innumerable obstacles of the most appalling character, a free and independent State, and which is recognized and received into the family of nations, by England, France Belgium, Prussia, and Brazil, and these governments extend to the Liberian Government every national courtesy, that the most fastidious nation could demand It is to a country possessing these advantages that we would invite the colored people of the United States, and from every other quarter, to come. It will be to the advantage of themselves, and their children, if they will without delay seek a home in Liberia, from the deep degradation which they are now living under. In making these remarks we are influenced by the most kindly feelings for our colored brethren We have nothing to gain by their coming to Liberia, indeed all the advantages will be on their side. But the fact is, we are greived to see that our brethren show a want of appreciation of the boon of liberty and equality, and in consequence our race is more and more slandered, and looked upon as subjects, fit only to be "hewers of wood and drawers of water."

The address of the Hon: Edward Everett, at the annual meeting of the American Colonization Society in January last, will, we are sure, be read with the liveliest emotions. Liberians, ought to feel a pride in reading it, and the colored people in the United States will find in it, matter for much reflection. We do not, however, beleive that every one will receive the address in that spirit, which we think is its due, for it is well known, there is no subject, however holy and magnanimous its character, but that many will be found to array themselves in hostility to it. We admire the tone of the address, and it is our opinion that all right-minded persons will think as we do about it.

Barque "Shirley." This vessel reached Baltimore the 10th May last, and cleared for Monrovia the 2d: of June. She may be expected here every hour.

Late advices from England, 23d June. state the price of Camwood to be £ 18. to £ 28 per ton, and the demand regular. The lowest price is for an inferior article, such as is obtained in the Sherbro. There is none such in our market. The camwood now in our city is being bought up for the London market, at $70 to $75—specie payments.

Palm oil readily sold at £35, 10. to £ 36, per ton and the probability was, that there would be an advance on these prices. Thousands of gallons have been bought up here, within the last fort-night for the London market, at 33-3 cents per gallon, specie payment; indeed the demand for African produce, of almost every description, is very great.

Vessels wanted. A ready market will be found in Liberia for six or more vessels, well built coppered and copper fastened, and drawing a light draft of water. Their burthen should be from 50 to 100 tons.

Rice, we are informed, can be purchased at Marshall in large quantities. As it is very scarce here, and selling at high prices, would it not be a good speculation to some of our merchants to send down a vessel and buy up a quantity? It is a matter well worthy of consideration.

Prince George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, has not yet made the first movement to ameliorate the condition of Boomtoo, who is now here a prisoner for acts committed under his direction. And if what we hear be true, and we have no reason to doubt it, Cain continues to violate his engagements with the Government. We trust the day is not far distant, when he will be compelled to demean himself properly. Old King Sand Fish, is loud in his complaints against Cain for his unfaithfulness to his solemn promises

It is now pretty generally known to most of our citizens, that the natives residing within our jurisdiction are not inclined to revive the slave trade, one exception perhaps may be made, and that is Prince Manna, of the Gallenas He is capable of committing any act, however dishonorable, if there be a possibility of his being a gainer in the end. Manna has often declared, that he would never again encourage the slave trade, and we know that in the early part of last year, he did actually engage to supply Don Chrispo with a cargo—but the other chiefs in the Gallenas, strongly opposed him, and he had finally to abandon the idea. Therefore if at any time, slaves are taken from any place in our jurisdiction, it will be through the baseness of Prince Manna. But the Government is keeping a strict watch on the gentleman.

It is now many months since our harbour was honored with the presence of an American vessel of war. What has become of them? We are anxiously looking for the arrival of the U. S. ship "Constitution," bearing the broad pendant of Commodore Mayo. the Commander in-Chief of the U. S. Naval forces on the West Coast of Africa.

Arrived on the 15th inst., Rev. Alex. Crummell, A. B. & family, per. British Mail steamer "Forerunner" from England. We learn that Mr. Crummell comes at the instance of the A. B. F. mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church, under the supervision of Rt Rev. Bishop Payne,—his field of operation will be either in this or the county of Grand Bassa. Mr. no doubt, will prove a very efficient ecclesiastical auxilliary in this important field of missionary labor The Protestant Episcopal Mission has heretofore, confined their efforts to the south coast, and this part of Liberia was overlooked, until Rev. J. W. Stokes in 1850, organized an Episcopal Church in this place. No doubt this is the begining of better days.

DEAD BONES PREACH.

The bones of departed friends, sleeping in the dust, may well preach to the living. Enter the graveyards, walk among the tombs commune with the ashes of the dead, ye who are worldly, volatile, and gay. You may there hear sermons repleto with wisdom.

Human bones, however, are not here intended but those of a horse. A young man of a philosophical and skeptical turn of mind, wandered away on the Sabbath morning in summer. He walked down the bank of a small river, and then into a grove of trees, and when in the vicinity of a farm house, he came to a collection of bones. He took up some of them in his hands He compared them with each other in respect to length, size, and structure. This join, that socket, and that head of a bone attracted his deep and admiring attention. What wisdom, what evident design, what adaptation of one to another, what benevolent use in respect to motion and strength? Surely, there is a God, nor in this a work of chance. When this young man was admitted to the Church as a penitent believer in Christ, he said. "These bones of a horse preached me the loudest sermon that I ever heard."—Christian Chronicle.

POETRY

THE ANGEL GUIDE.

BY MRS. EMILY C. JUDSON.

I GAZED down life's dim labyrinth,
A wildering maze to see,
Crossed o'er by many a tangled clue;
And wild as wild could be;
And as I paused in doubt and dread,
An ang l came to me.

I knew him for a heavenly guide,
I knew him even then,
Though meekly as a child he stood
Among the sons of men:
By his deep spirit loveliness,
I knew him even then.

And as I leaned my weary head
Upon his proffered breast,
And scanned the peril-haunted wild,
From out my place of rest,
I wondered if the shining ones
Of Eden were more blest

For there was light within my soul,
Light on my peaceful way;
And all around the blue above,
The clustering starlight lay;
And easterly, I saw upreared,
The pearly gates of day.

So, hand in hand, we trod the wild,—
My angel-love and I.—
His lifted wing all quivering
With tokens from the sky;
Strange my dull thought could not divine,
'Twas gifted but to fly.

Again down life's dim labyrinth,
I grope my way alone,
While wildly through the midnight sky,
Black, hurrying clouds are blown,
And the sky in my tangled path,
The sharp, bare thorns are sown.

Yet firm my foot, since well I know
The goal cannot be far:
And ever through the rifted clouds,
Beams out one steady star;
For when my guide went up he left
The pearly gates afar.

Annual Meeting of the American Colonization Society.

ELECTION OF JOHN H. B. LATROBE, ESQ., PRESIDENT.

We had the pleasure of attending the thirty-sixth anniversary of the American Colonization Society, held at Washington, D. C., on the 18th and 19th January, and witnessed with great satisfaction its very interesting proceedings. There was a remarkably full attendance of delegates from the several State Auxiliaries and members of the Society generally, induced probably, by the duty devolving upon them of electing a president to supply the place of Mr Clay, one of the founders of the Society and so long its able champion and honored head. The public meeting on the evening of the 18th was well attended, and the exercises uncommonly interesting. Mr. Everett, the present Secretary of State, made the opening and principal speech, which, our readers will no doubt thank us for giving them in full, as reported. Mr. E has never, we believe, been a very active advocate of the Society although long its patron and friend. We notice, that he approved and advocated a resolution at the annual meeting of the Society, twenty-one years since, declaring "Colonization of the Coast of Africa as the most efficient mode of suppressing the slave trade and civilizing the African Continent." His present able speech is mainly in support of the same proposition and it has established it beyond controversy.—Mr. Everett was followed by the Rev. Mr. Read of Richmond, in a short but spirited address, which fully justified the expectations of his friends. After Mr. Read the Hon. Charles Fenton Mercer, chairman of the meeting, one of the oldest vice-presidents of the Society, and, for years, its most able advocate, addressed the meeting, giving a most interesting history of the events of its early organization. Perhaps no gentleman did more for the Society, during the first years of its struggling existence, than Mr. Mercer, and he merits the warmest gratitude of every friend of the cause.

On the 19th, the Society proceeded to the election of a President, and the very full attendance of its members indicated the deep interest felt in the matter. There seemed to be two opinions prevailing, not so much in regard to the candidates proposed, as to the principles which ought to control the choice. One party advocating the election of a person of high and widely extended political reputation and who would give to the office the prestige of a name connected with the public affairs of the country. The other party desiring, that, while the position and standing of the individual chosen, ought to be considered, he should bring to the service of the Society a thorough knowledge of the subject of Colonization, and ability and disposition to advance its interests. After a free and courteous interchange of opinion upon the subject by the most distinguished gentlemen of the Society; it became apparent, that a large majority of the members present were in favor of the principle of electing a man of a tive usefulness. The minority readily acquiesced and declined offering a candidate. When on motion, John H. B. Latrobe, Esq. of this city, was unanimously elected president of the Society.

It seems to us, that no man in the Union could be considered a more perfect representative or embodiment of the class or kind preferred by the majority, as above, than Mr. Latrobe. To most of our readers his name, as a colonizationist, requires neither qualification or comment. In the State of Maryland it is inseparably connected with the subject, and from the Legislative Halls to the most obscure * * * hut, Colonization or Liberia cannot be mentioned without reference to it. Even a Grebo Palaver, in our Cape Palmas Colony, can hardly come off without mixing up Latroba with their jargon.

For near thirty years, Mr. Latrobe has been more or less actively engaged in the cause of African Colonization. In 1822 when a student in the office of Gen. Harper, its able and efficient friend, he drew, under the direction of Dr. Ayres, the founder of the Colony, the first map of its territory, when General Harper gave it the name of LIBERIA, and Mr. Latrobe gave to its capital the name, which it now holds, of MONROVIA. In 1826 he attempted to procure the aid of the Masonic fraternity, and at his instance, measures were adopted, which obtained from that body numerous contributions of funds in aid of the American Colonization Society. In 1827, he was active with others in reorganizing the Maryland Auxiliary. At the Annual Meeting of the parent Society in 1828, he made a speech, in which he advocated the immediate purchase of Cape Palmas, as an eligible site for an American settlement.—In the following year, we find him again speaking at the Annual Meeting; and shipment after shipment of emigrants from Baltimore were made while he acted for the Society at Washington. From the organization of the Maryland State Colonization Society under its charter, in 1831, Mr. Latrobe's labors have been mainly in connexion with it, for some years as its Corresponding Secretary, and for the last sixteen its President, during the whole period, it is but justice to him and no injustice to the able and intelligent gentlemen associated with him in the management of the Society, to say, that he has been its spirit and moving principle. Whether Mr. Latrobe will fulfill the expectations of those who have been instrumental in placing him at the head of the American Colonization Society, time will determine, but we believe the principle which governed the election was the true one, and as the perfect representative of that principle, we believe, his equal cannot easily be designated.—African Repository

THE NIAGARA OF CITIES.

We find a most beautiful and truthful description of London in a letter to the New York Recorder.

London is the Niagara of cities. Deep, mighty, approaching even the moral sublime, is the never ceasing, ever rushing, tide of life and activity that rolls and thunders over its solid pavements, and like—or, rather, immeasurably beyond—Niagara, the elements of interests are too various and on too vast a scale, to be taken in without much seeing and reflection. One needs to return again and again to its large and beautiful parks—those immense tracts of rural loveliness which lie embosomed within the great city, to wander again and again through the solemn aisles and chapels of Westminster Abbey, to return day after day to the spoils of ages accumulated in the halls of the British Museum, to track out the numberless localities fraught with thrilling memories of the olden time; to pass and re-pass from the rush and whirl of business in Cheapside, Fleet street, and the Strand, to the regal magnificence and repose of the "West End;" to roam through countless numbers of well-built, well lighted well-paved, clean, and handsome streets, everywhere interspersed with those open squares which in New York we should dignify with the name of parks; one must thus gradually fill and feed his mind with the numberless elements of interest that lie about him, before he can even faintly conceive the greatness, the majesty of London.

It is not, strictly speaking, a showy city. Its edifices, private and public, are generally built for use and durability rather than for display, and those which have any claim to architectural magnificence unfortunately owe it to location which deprives them of half their effect. St. Paul's, the architectural pride of London, is so wretchedly hemmed in by the buildings which encircle it, that its immense magnitude and architectural splendor scarcely add any thing to the beauty of the city. Little better can be said of the new Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey. And in the smoky, foggy atmosphere which for two thirds of the year envelopes London like a cloud, much even of its actual beauty is but dimly visible. Still, with all these drawbacks, it is not unworthy, even in its outward aspect, to be the commercial and moral metropolis of the world. Beyond all the finest sights of London—beyond even Westminster Abbey and the British Museum—is London itself. This is the great, the sublime spectacle, a source of never-failing wonder and admiration.

Among the most attractive physical features of the city are its public squares and parks, those oases of rural verdure amidst the vast desert of brick and stone, those isles of repose amidst the billows of life and activity that are beating and breaking around them. Besides the smaller squares which I have referred to—as large as the New York parks, and which may be counted by scores over the city; besides the spacious Victoria Park, in the north east and the splendid Regent's Park with its zoological and botanical gardens, to the north west; besides these, you may pass for two entire miles through an almost unbroken succession of the loveliest rural scenery, along the banks of beautiful sheets of water in which lovely islets lie embosomed, amidst flowers and shrubbery of rare beauty, over closely shaven and gently undulating lawns, beneath the shade of majestic trees, through St. James's Park, Green Park Hyde Park, and Kensington Gardens, the rural solitude around you agreeably contrasted and heightened by the long ranges of princely residences shining dimly in the smoky distance, and the subdued but steady roar which, like the voice of many waters, is borne to the ear from the distant thoroughfares of the metropolis. I have stood in St. James's Park in the mellow sunlight of an October afternoon, with Buckingham Palace, St. James's Palace, and the Marlboro House in full view, the venerable towers of Westminster Abbey and the towers of the Houses of Parliament rising in the distance and around me lawns and miniature lakes, sleeping in tranquil beauty, and I have thought that earth could scarcely present a scene more enchanting. These spots as well as the suburbs of London, have to me an irresistible fascination; I am drawn to them again and again, and for a few days have deeply regretted the ruins which have dislodged me from my favorite haunts.—The True Union

African Colonization and Civilization.

THE cause of African Colonization is one which we have watched with profound interest for several years past. We have recognized it as one of those great moral enterprises which have for the aim the amelioration of human woes, and as an agency happily calculated to afford a practical outlet and prudent direction to that deep and active sympathy which all enlightened and benevolent minds cherish for the oppressed and degraded children of Africa. Although the movements of this cause have been unostentatious and comparatively noiseless' yet they have given indications of quiescent strength and practical efficiency which presage for it an augmenting success, and ultimately the accomplishment of its great and philanthopic purposes.

The primary object of the Colonization movement is to facilitate the return of the free people of color from this country to Africa, the heaven-appointed home of the colored race. In connection with this object, which has special reference to the improvement of the condition of this class of persons, various other beneficent results are contemplated which have already been realized in part, and must, according to present indications, continue to be more and more fully developed. We refer to the extinction of the slave trade, and the civilization and evangelization of the barbarous tribes of Africa. These results have, as we said, already been realized in part; and the friends of Colonization discover, in this partial success, an earnest of what coming generations shall witness in this field of moral enterprise. Of these secondly, but not less important, objects of the Colonization cause, we cannot now speak. Our design at present is merely to notice briefly its primary purpose, namely, to improve the condition of the free people of this country. We are aware that the motives of those who have enlisted in this cause have been impeached, and that they have been accused of desiring the removal of our free colored inhabitants merely from a dislike or hatred of the race. We trust it is no longer necessary to vindicate the pure and noble spirits that have been engaged in this movement from such unfounded aspersions. Their self-sacrificing and unobtrusive deeds of charity in this great work are an ample refutation of such calumnies. It is moreover unjust to attribute actions so manifestly beneficent in their results to motives so low and unworthy. That the condition of our free colored people may be greatly improved by Colonization in Liberia has, we think, been fully demonstrated.—We have but to look at their condition here, present and prospective, and then turn to that flourishing colony, in order to be assured that this is the case. One cannot contemplate their social, religious, and political state in this country, even in the most favored localities, without realizing that their lot is an unfortunate and gloomy one. They are debarred from those social privileges, religious institutions, and political franchises, which are essential to their elevation in the scale of being. They are regarded as an inferior race, and have few or no encouragement held out to them to strive for distinction in any noble pursuit. Their color and physiological peculiarities stamp this state of things with the character of permanence, or, at least must perpetuate it to a very remote period.—Christianity itself can never break down all those barriers which separate the white from the colored race. The shocking and repulsive idea of amalgamation between the two races affords the only ray of hope for the colored race in this country. Against this alternative, every right and noble instinct of the white race must indignantly protest. These same natural instincts will also to a great degree, exclude our colored population from a participation in those social religious, and political privileges, which are necessary to their prosperity and highest possible advancement. With this constitution of things, the friends of Colonization wage no war. They are willing to let it remain as God has fixed it; and are striving by all means in their power, to retrieve the wrongs of former ages, and bring back the different members of the human family into those separate jurisdictions and allotments in which God evidently designed, they should live. They are convinced that the black race in this country can only be elevated in the scale of moral, intellectual, and political being, by transferring them to the land of their nativity, and freeing them from the restraints which they must ever feel in the presence of a superior race. In Africa, our free colored people may enjoy perfect social equality with those of their own race, and become their own legislators, and the arbiters of their own destiny. There they may enjoy a climate perfectly adapted to their constitutions, and secure adequate returns for their labor, not merely in the form of stocks, moneys, and real estate, but also in the form of that influence and respectability which honest labor and successful industry almost invariably confer.

Such are, in brief, some of the benefits which the Colonization enterprise aims to confer upon the free * * * in our midst. Let all, then, who desire to afford substantial, not mere sympathetic aid to this unfortunate class of persons, give their countenance and support to this philanthropic and Christian undertaking. And let our free colored people before they reject the friendly advices and offices of those who are thus seeking their good, weigh carefully the inducements which are thus offered to their desires for social and religious advancement, and their laudable ambition for honor and political power.—African Repository.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD

Christians are ordained by the Saviour to be the light of the world; and not only its light but its salt. They are to diffuse a healthful savour through the mass. In a word, it is the design of Heaven that the church should instamp its character on the world, and thus reclaim it to the proper and original design of its creation. But it is a serious question, whether a process the very reverse of this, is not going on in our community. Is not the world communicating its stamp, its image, its spirit to the church? Is not the line which separates the two, becoming, from year to year, less and less distinct? And is there no danger least it be wholly effaced? Do not Christian professors adopt the same projects and embark in the same schemes, as worldly men, and too often with the same ardor and in the use of the same unlawful or questionable means? Are they not almost equally attracted by the honors and distinctions of the world? Do they not obsequiously yield to the laws and caprices of the Great Fashion to the neglect of the plain injunctions of conscience and the Bible? Are not various forms of dissipation and amusement, which were once considered as excluded and renounced by a profession of religion, now familiarly introduced into the bosom of Christian families? In a word, may not the men of the world, the irreligious, with too much reason say to many Christian professors, "You may believe what you please, and you may profess what you please. But give us the countenance of your example."—Christian Chronicle.

SINGLE WOMEN.

Not being mother on their own account, they have leisure to be mothers for every body else. What a blessing in the circle of the families to which she belongs is an unmarried sister! She watches by the aged father and mother with a vestal's fidelity, while her sisters and brothers abandon the old homestead for Cupid, or cupidity. Who so ready as she to solace the bereavement of a friend, all of whose earthly hopes have been swallowed up in the grave? To the widowed brother, her sympathetic voice and spontaneity of kindness seem almost like a return from the tomb of the idol he had laid there, and to the bereaved sister, whose stay and support have been stricken down, she becomes, as it were, the strength of another manhood. Next to the mother herself, she is the last to cease her expostulations with a wayward daughter, or her efforts to reclaim an unfilial son. To children bereft of parents, she becomes both father and mother, and trains unconscious orphanage in the way it should go. How Protean her capabilities of usefulness, transforming herself by turns into friend nurse physician or spiritual guide; into the grave companion of the old, or the frocked one playmate of the young, as ever-varying occasion may demand! Who does not know that when any child of all her kindred is deaf, or blind, or halt, or whom a stepdame Nature has maltreated in any other way, a never-failing resource is found in the "universal Aunty;" as though she kept a full assortment of eyes and ears and faculties for all kinds of "impotent folk!" Then for the children's dresses, does she not always know the latest style; for their learning, has she not the newest cure-all all by heart; and O! for the romping and boistering groups of the nursery, does she not carry all the toyshops of France and China in her pockets? Who, of all the household, can help paying homage to such a divinity, even though it does sometimes seem as though she would kill us with kindness?

Outside, and beyond the family relation, this personage often becomes a kind of public character, though without the envy or the odium which attaches to the notoriety of public men. As a teacher of schools, how she shames the wisdom of the lawgiver and the retributions of the Judge, by saving where they sacrifice, and redeeming where they destroy! To hospitals for disease and suffering, to prisons for penal retributions, to receptacles for reformation from deeper debasement and guilt, how divinely does she come, her head encircled with a halo of heavenly light, her feet sweetening the earth on which she treads, and the celestial radiance of her benignity making vice begin its work of repentance through very envy of the beauty of virtue! The two Misses Follows of Boston, within the last ten years, have found homes for more than a thousand destitute orphan children, carrying on this warfare against ignorance and perdition, as the apostle said, at their own charges. What mothers, unless it be such as the mother of Washington, deserve so much as they the admiration and homage of mankind?—Horace Mann.

OLD AGE.

Winter, which strips the leaves from around us, makes us see the distant regions they formerly concealed, says Jean Paul; and so does old age rob us of our enjoyments only to enlarge the prospect of eternity before us. There is something very beautiful in the contemplation of gray hairs and honorable old age. It is the harvest hour of mortality, when the ripened experience shines forth, like fields of golden grain ready for the sickle. There is quiet repose and steadiness about the happiness of old age, if the life has been well spent, that robs its feebleness of all painful suggestions. There is in that still noble though wrinkled brow so much that speaks of wisdom—in that eye such philosophical expression—that one feels overpowered with profound respect in such a presence.

Nature which does all things well, has wisely ordained those peculiarities which we in our ignorance might regard as troubles. Thus, the partial deafness is the result, doubtless, of an express and wise arrangement on Providence in constructing the human body; the gradual loss of hearing being intended to give ease and quietude to the decline of life, when any noise or sound from without would but discompose the nervous system and prevent peaceful meditation. He who would pass the comfort, (says Addison,) should, when young, consider that he may one day become old; and remember when he is old, that he has once been young. It is, of course, an undeniable fact, that while on one old age sits gracefully, on another it is far less becoming.

Age is venerable, however, and when it is not worthy of our respect, it promptly challenges our pity. There is something surpassingly beautiful in seeing those whose heads are silvered with age leaning for support and guidance, in their turn, upon those children whose infancy they cradled in infancy. It teaches so forcibly the law of domestic brotherhood, and illustrates so perfectly the fact of our dependence one upon another, at all stages, from the cradle to the tomb. It is a tender lesson of affection also, of the purest kind, unselfish, and dutiful. In these modern times, old age is getting to be a lease, and nature is less and less inclined to sign, and there are no tenants at will.

Rochefoucauld has cunningly and wisely said, "Few people know how to be old." To be happy and beloved in age, it is necessary that we should be ever true to nature, and carry our age along with us, so to speak. We must never forget that we are old, nor think that younger folks err because they do not look at life through spectacles like ourselves. We should strive to look ever on the bright side, that we may thus keep up a perpetual spring, and season of flowers, in our souls. Steele very bluntly says, "A healthy old fellow, that is not a fool, is the happiest creature living."—Gleason's Pictorial

WONDERFUL WORKS OF THE CREATOR.

The mariner who first crossed the Atlantic in search of a new world was astonished when, on the 19th of September, 1492, he found himself in the midst of that great bank of sea weed—the sea weed meadow of Oviedo—the Sargasso sea which, with a varying breadth of 100 to 300 miles, stretches over twenty-five degrees of latitud, covering over 260,000 square miles in surface, like a huge floating garden, in which countless myriads of minute animals find food and shelter. Now, it is the eddy of numerous sea rivers which collect in one spot, and the cold water of the Northern Atlantic mixing with the warm streams of the southern and western currents, which produce the temperature most fitted to promote this amazing development of vegetable and animal life. What becomes of the dead remains of this vast marine growth? Do they decompose as fast as they are produced, or do they accumulate into deposites of peculiar coal, destined to reward the researches of future geologists and engineers, when the Atlantic of our day has become the habitable land of an after time? In the chart of the Pacific Ocean we are presented with another remarkable instance of the influence of sea rivers on vegetation.

From the shores of South Victoria, on the antarctic continent, a stream of cold water sixty degrees in width (our readers will recollect, that in high latitudes 60 degrees of longitude are very narrow,) drifts constantly in a northeast and easterly direction across the Southern Pacific, till it infringes upon the South American coast to the south of Valparaiso. There it divides into two arms, one of which stretches south and east, doubles Cape Horn, and penetrates into the Southwestern Atlantic; the other flows first northeast and then northwest along the shores of Chili and Peru, carrying colder waters into the warm sea, and producing a colder air along the low plains which stretch from the shores of the Pacific to the base of the Andes. The current discovered by Humboldt and called after his name, lowers the temperature of the air about twelve degrees, while that of the water itself is sometimes as much as twenty-four degrees colder than that of the still waters of the ocean through which it runs. The cold air seriously affects the vegetation along the whole of the coast, at the same time that the cold stream raises fog and mists, which not only conceal the shores and perplex the navigator, but extend inland also and materially modify the climate.

The beautiful and beneficent character of modifying influence becomes not only apparent, but most impressive, when we consider, as the rain map of the world shows us, that on the coast of Peru no rain ever falls; and that, like the desert of Sahara, it ought, therefore, to be condemned to perpetual barrenness. But in consequence of the cold stream thus running along its borders, the atmosphere loses its transparency, and the sun is obscured for months together. The vapors at Lima are often so thick that the sun seen through them with the naked eye assumes the appearance of the moon's disc. They commence in the morning, and extend over the plains in the form of refreshing fogs, which disappear soon after midday, and are followed by heavy dews, which are precipitated during the night." The morning mists and evening dews thus supply the place of the absent rains, and the verdure which covers the plains is the offspring of a sea river. What a charming myth would the ancient poets have made out of this striking compensation.—Edinburg Review.

For the Liberia Herald

Extract from an address delivered by Mr. E. W. BLYDEN— before the G. U. O. Daughters of Temperance — Monrovia.

March 31st 1854.

The principles of temperance extensively diffused, would, beyond a doubt, ameliorate the condition of many in our country, scatter the darkness of ignorance, and be the forerunner of physical, moral and spiritual blessings to society. And it is gratifying to see the Ladies coming to the aid of the cause in Liberia—Their influence though gentle is powerful and effective. If the members of this society persevere in carrying out their principles, at all times and in all places; if they perform faithfully the duties enjoined upon them by their pledge—they will certainly succeed to some extent at least, in arresting the alarming progress of intemperance, that terrible monster, whose ravages are seen and felt among us. O who can estimate the amount of misery which it has produced in the world, the deep anguish and sorrow it has caused! How many a hopeful youth has it borne in its ruthless grasp to ruin and despair! How many has it carried to an early grave! Thousands and tens of thousands are annually among its victims—Many a promising husband has it reduced to vice, poverty and rags—and many a tender and affectionate wife has been made to suffer its brutalizing consequences. It has caused the grey hairs of many a fond parent to go down in sorrow to the grave! It has produced more misery and suffering—than any of the numberless evils, that have succeeded the fall, call up before your minds all the mighty hosts that have been slain in war, summon to your remembrance the thousands slain to gratify the ambition of an Alexander, or, the thousands that fell by the legions of Cæsar—or those which were slain in the wars of Napoleon, enumerate the numbers of beings who have been smitten by pestilence or have perished in famine—call up the vast company that sleep in the watery deep, and the number of all these put together sinks into insignificance compared with the number of the victims of intemperance—Wars, pestilence and famine have slain their thousands but intemperance has slain its tens of thousand, nay its millions—

But O we know not the half of the evils of intemperance, could we draw aside the vail which intervenes between us and the eternal world—and could our visual organs endure a sight of the abode of lost spirits, then alone might we form a tolerable estimate of the awful—the unspeakable miseries and sufferings which result from a too familiar intercourse with this deceiver and destroyer, of the human family—We perceive, however, in our daily experience and observation enough of its evil consequences to inspire us with determined and perpetual abhorrence of it, and to render us diligent in arming ourselves, and those under our influence, against its assaults.

It is ruinous to the physical intellectual, social and spiritual interests of man. The most eminent Physicans, both in Europe and America are unanimous in their testimony against alcoholic liquors. They pronounce them poisonous—altogether injurious to health of body and vigor of mind, possessing no alimentary properties whatever,—and none will question this testimony who has for any time observed the effects produced by their frequent use. Who more unhealthy and miserable than the man who continually places himself under the influence of ardent spirits? The poisonous liquid preys upon his vitals, pervades the blood and engenders diseases of the most awful nature. Under its influence the frame becomes emaciated and deformed, the bodily powers enervated—and the man is rendered unfit for business, idle and reckless he wanders to and fro an object of commission, malignant fevers, apoplexy, madness, delirium tremens are among its bitter fruits, but even where it does not produce these awful consequences—still, it impairs the mind in a considerable degree, every one knows that a man under the influence of spirituous liquor cannot safely engage in any undertaking—especially such as require the exercise of the mental faculties

The mind, on such occasions either becomes dormant and inactive or, so excited as to be unable to sustain the least amount of care, hence not unfrequently has an entire loss of reason resulted from the too common use of ardent spirits. Hear the testimony of Solomon. "Who hath wo"? who hath sorrow? who hath contentious? who hath babblings? who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine," Prov. xxiii–29 30.

Again the destructive tendency of alcoholic drink appears in its effect on the social condition of men. It unfits them for every other society but that of the inebriate. In every other place except the grogshop. The husband once industrious and happy, providing carefully for the wants of his family,—kind and loving to his wife, folding her to his fond embrace, and contributing to her happiness in every respect has become through intemperance, a hideous monster, a source of trouble and disquietude to his family and a nuisance to all around him. In an evil hour, under deceptive influences he was led to take a glass—then another glass, and then another until he entered fairly the broad road of inebriation. He is now a lover and frequent visitor of dramshops, and delighting in the company of those who rise early and sit up late to drink strong drink he is continually found among them. Go now to his house, and how changed the scene! what an awful blight rests upon every thing! The once loving husband is now cross and peevish, the tormentor of his family the source of their greatest trouble and keenest anguish; his house once tidy and neat, is now confused and disorderly his children once happy are now wretched and miserable, having a father who, lazy and idle, and worse than an infidel provides no more for his household. himself is distinguished only by his emaciated frame his bloated countenance, his red and swollen eyes,—and his slow and faltering steps—the very picture of wretchedness

He feels misery within, sees misery without and around him, he has no peace nor comfort, and often under such circumstances are men led to suicidal acts—and thus terminate the sufferings of the body by the everlasting destruction of the soul.

The son, once dutiful and loving, upon whom the warmest affections of his parents were centered,—who was their comfort and joy, in whom they prided themselves, as they looked forward to the position of eminence and usefulness which he promised to occupy in the future. That son who would rather have died than disobey his father or give pain to his mother, at an unfortunate moment being led away and enticed by sinners yielded to their allurements and entered with them upon the path of ruin. He is now bold and daring careless and unconcerned about the advice of his mother and the instruction of his father. He regards not a mother's tears—he becomes harsh and unfeeling. His father remonstrates but he needs it not, his mother weeps but he is unmoved, beguiled and infatuated he persists in his iniquity—goes on from one degree of vice unto another, until nature sinks beneath the load of woes which he has induced upon himself,—he passes away to the drunkard's grave—a grief to his father,—a heaviness to his mother and an enemy to himself for ever.

And have we not seen the pernicious effects of ardent spirit in our own country—in our own community?

Do we not see how the prosperity of many is retarded by their overfondness for the intoxicating glass? how they are led astray by this insinuating and dreadful enemy of all social and private happiness?

Yes, we see some among us, who, were it not for their infatuation in pursuing the dreadful poison—might be more intelligent and useful than they are and of more service to their country.

But alas! they yield themselves to the influence of this deceitful and powerful foe—and are led captive by it at its will. It not only forbids their improvement in knowledge, but also renders them idle and reckless, inspires them with a total abhorrence of all labor and an insatiable appetite for pleasure, in consequence of which they are neither of service to themselves nor others.

Again, the evil tendency of ardent spirits appears in their effects on the spiritual—and the most important interests of men,—"No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven," is the stern declaration of Scripture. "No drunkard." The prohibition is extensive, it is universal. Whether he be an occasional drunkard, or whether he be a habitual drunkard, it matters not.

No drunkard, dying such, can enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whether he be a king or a peasant,—a rich man or a beggar—if he die a drunkard, he has no mansion prepared for him in those pure, and unsullied regions where God reigns in awful majesty! No, no, he has no seat among those scenes of purity and delight—And why? Because none but holy beings go there. Nothing that defileth or maketh a lie can ever gain admittance into those pearly gates—None can walk those golden streets, but the pure in heart—None but true christians—And can the drunkard be a christian—can the man who habitually sets the commands of his Maker at defiance be a christian? The thing is impossible—the idea involves a monstrous absurdity—unpardonable presumption—A christian, a drunkard—How inconsistent! how preposterous! A christian strictly speaking is one who fears God, and works according to his precepts—one who hates and avoids sin, but who loves and pursues righteousness,—And in order to be such a christian the intellectual faculties must be exercised—christianity or lizion is not poured upon man as we would pour liquid into an inanimate vessel. No, the man must cooperate with the unseen agent who performs the glorious work upon his soul.—He must receive the gift by the hand of that faith which has been wrought in him by the Holy Spirit. And before this blessing is conferred the man must feel his need of it, and before this feeling can be produced reflection and careful deliberation on his part are necessary. There must be an examination of himself—a reasoning together with God—and can a drunkard reason? Is he susceptible of reflection, Is he capable of those feelings which make a man anxious to seek his maker? No so far from seeking reconciliation with God he plunges deeper and deeper into rebellon, provoking the vengeance of heaven, can he pray then in this awful state? No he can not, nor does he desire to pray—He is an alien from every source of comfort and happiness. But he may be reclaimed while life lasts—Let him turn from the fatal cup—and he may be a christian—Let him forsake his sin and he shall live.—

We see then that the poor drunkard whether physically, socially, or spiritually contemplated is in a deplorable state.—He is not only excluded from the society of those whom the world esteems respectable—but also from the church to which the poorest and humblest are invited and welcomed—and if this were all his case might be supposed a tolerable one, but he will be forever excluded from heaven—from the presence of God and the holy angels from all that is pure—and lovely and happy. Nor is this all, he will be banished to that land of darkness—where the worm of the inhabitants dieth not, and where the fire is never quenched—whence the smoke and cries of the tormented ascend forever and ever—

Ah! Did you ever see a drunkard die? Pitiable indeed must be the spectacle —Behold him standing upon the confines of two worlds—the one receding from him, and fading in the distance the other pressing hard upon him with all its strange and awful realities—Then for the first time, perhaps, in a long series of years, is he in his senses. He finds himself in this solemn situation—with awful apprehensions a dismal prospect before him—He beholds before him the blackness of darkness—and he would fain console himself with the hope that that dark pathway was but the introduction to a region of pleasure and delight—but as he lingers trembling between fear and hope—he hears in tones of thunder a voice from above declaring—"No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven" He beholds at his feet the boisterous stream of Jordan—threatening his destruction—terror stricken he looks back upon the world—upon his past life, if perchance he might discern any prop upon which to rest his sinking soul while passing through the angry waves—but he can see nothing he has no recollection of the past His life spent upon earth is to him, a perfect blank. He was not his own master—He yielded himself a willing captive to the demon of intemperance and was led by him at his will—Now he has time only to behold his supreme folly—he has time only to imprecate himself as the instrument of his own destruction, he has time only to curse the day on which he was born—and then takes a reluctant sleap into the dark"

Awful! Awful! indeed is the condition of the poor drunkard—Who would not pity him? Who would not seek to rescue him from his awful state—to pluck him as a brand from the eternal burning?—

O thrice and four times—yea five times happy they who have never touched the intoxicating glass—whose hands have never handled the fatal poison!

You ladies, by uniting yourselves under the title you have, show that you are at least desirous of rescuing the poor inebriate. You have assumed a position which implies, that you individually, and as a body discountenance the use of ardent spirits as a beverage. Nay—the first article in your constitution if I mistake not is in array against it. Thus do you set a noble example to your brethren—Holding in your pliant and tender hands the crystal cup, and pointing, to the limpid fountain you say drink drink, and live. May your efforts be crowned with success.

But lamentable to state, there is a class of persons among us who are obviously not desirous of saving the drunkard, but who on the contrary—appear willing to help him on his destructive course They are those who hold establishments for the sale of spirituous liquors either by wholesale or retail—They dispense with hard and unrelenting hearts the poisonous draught to their fellow men, notwithstanding they see its awful consequences They see that it unfits a man, for buisiness, unfits him for Society, unfits for usefulness, either to himself or others,—still for the sake of pecuniary gain—for the sake of a few pieces of silver—they will administer the poison—Despite the specious arguments by which such men justify themselves and the plausible excuses by which they endeavor to palliate their crime—the fact is clear that they are not the true friends of their country, nor are they the lovers of mankind,—They know that ardent spirits are injurious to the bodies and souls of men, yet they care not, provided certain ends are gained how many souls are ruined—O ye dispensers of the liquid poison—how can you participate in the ruination of your brethren? How can you endure their destruction. Ah! you may now line your hearts with steel so as to be rendered insensible to the appeals of humanity—and to the sufferings which you occasion, but O depend upon it you will feel them some day—some day will they press upon you with all their painful and heart-rending associations, you will not be able on a dying bed to endure a retrospect of your life—You will there behold, unless you shall have been entirely blinded by the god of this world, unless your conscience shall have been completely seared as with a hot iron, the many workings of your cupidity arrayed before you—these will haunt your dying bed.—

O the deathbed of a man who has spent most of his life in dispensing ardent spirits—a fatal poison—must be extremely awful—he looks back upon his past life, and is terrified at the mischief he has done—he sees that he has been engaged in scattering arrows firebrands and death. He attempts to seek his maker, but guilt with its hideous countenance stares him in the face and depresses hisspirits,—He sees dark clouds pregnant with wrath deepening in their fearful gloom—between him and his Creator, threatening to vent their fury upon his denuded soul. His spirit recoils—he shrinks back in terror and dread, but ah! he has no refuge from the storm—no hiding place to which he can flee—On the one hand he is met by the execrations of those to whose destruction he has contributed On every hand he beholds judgment eager to seize him—he sees stern justice with its fearful sword drawn ready to wreak its vengeance upon the guilty head. Alas! how awful how dreadful is the condition of such a man—what consternation—death strikes the fatal blow—His spirit enters the world of spirits—where he meets the wretched beings who had visited his car, while on earth, and he par— bar of rock-ing—a bar of inflexible justice—over which there presides a Judge who is always angry with the wicked—who will say unto all such "Depart from me, ye cursed into everlasting fire"——

Cape Palmas. The Sloop "Dido" of Cape Palmas arrived here on the morning of the 17th inst.—having on board the Honorable Saml F. Mcgill, late, the Governor of Cape Palmas. We have had the pleasure of paying our respects to the Governor, and learn from him that the people of Cape Palmas have dissolved their connection with the Maryland State Colonization Society in the United States; and declared themselves a soverigen, independent people. On the 29th of May last their Constitution was adopted by the people, and on the 6th inst an election of officers took place under it; and Governor Prout was inaugurated on the 8th. The same day according to previous arrangements, Governor McGill resigned office as the representative of the Maryland State Colonization Society. Cape Palmas, is now to be called, pursuant to the vote of the people, "State of Maryland in Liberia." We congratulate our brethren on the change in their position—making themselves, a sovereign people. We would remind them, that they must exert themselves, to prove to the world their capability of sustaining the new responsibilities they have assumed

We know nothing about their constitution, but it is reasonable to suppose it is republican in all its features. The officers under it are elected to serve two years. We are informed, that one of the most prominent articles in the constitution, is the prohibition, under any circumstances, of spirituous liquors being landed in the State. The following persons were elected to serve the first term

Wm. A Prout.	Governor.
B. T. Drayton.	Lieut: do.
Joseph S. Gibson.
John B Bowen.
Thomas fuller
Anthy: Wood.	Senators.
John E. Motten.
John Cooper
Chas: H. Harman.
Henry Pinkitt
Danl: F. Wilson.	Delegates.
Saml: S. Reynold.	High Sheriff.
Peter Scisco.	Coroner.

Appointed by the Governor—Hon. E. Mayson Secretary of State. The Governor was inaugurated on the 8th inst.

For the Liberia Herald

LIBERIA'S INDEPENDENCE & THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Herald.

To be a backwoods man in Africa, causes one to miss hearing much that is going on on the world. Well sir, I never knew that the question of Liberia's recognition as an independant Government had ever come before the United States Senate and been negatived; until Justus told me so in the Herald that came to hand yesterday after almost one years absence from my door. What astounded me was, that Justus seems to write as though he expected a recognition of the independence of this Government of colored people by the Government of the United States. How could any colored man entertain such an idea enough, to be disappointed, at the dismission of the subject on the ground of its being "inexpedent"? How could any true Liberian wish such a thing of that Government? I only wonder that the question came up atall in the United States Senate. Who was he that was foolhardy enough to attempt such a measure? Did some strange event get an English Missionary into the United States Senate? Who else on earth could have attempted such a thing? Did some Old Liberian rise from the dead, and metemorphose himself into a Senator? To show his predilections for the U. S.? No, the love of Liberty brought them, too far from it. A recognition of the Independance of the Republic of Liberia by the United States expected? Desired? expected by a colored man? a "Negro"? "a Free negro"? I know colonization has many warm friends in the United States. This great cause has two classes of supporters, among the individuals who sustain it in that great Nation.

The 1st class, I beliva truly pity the blackman and love his soul. Feeling that man should be free, and a blackman is a man, they desire this great gift of God for Him. They see no hope of the colored man enjoying this blessing in any spot claimed by the United States therefore they aid him to go where he can enjoy Liberty free from the rascal grasp, of a Republic of monarchs over Negroes. And they hope by doing this, that in the fulfilling Gods Gospel designs may bless a continent by the Literary, and Religious elevation of their flying dark skined brother; hence the school, the missionary the Bible. God of Heaven bless these, men of justice, mercy, and of truth, for this righteous repayment of labour. The 2nd Class of Colonizationists, are those who want the free negro gone, devil take him the day he starts; let him go as far as wind and water can carry him away over the sea, from me, let the gulf that lies between be bridgeless. Their aid let them continue it has aided in blessing thousands, we are free and the devil has not got us either. God has often blessed the careless penny given to good. But what is there in all this to lead a blackman to expect favors of the kind, if it be a favor from the United States Government? I mean recognition &c I have long since put down the religion and the benevolent institutions of the United States as one thing, and the Governments of the United States as another thing. And have looked upon colonization as differing from both, and still as a thing through which the religion and state policy of the United States do come close enough to get a distant peep at each other by the telescope of a design, that I believe will be matured, and over which, it may shake hand and shout, in the Redemption of that country from negro slavery as it now revels, and debauches, itself in its damnation by negro slavery. From Africa went the blackman, to Africa, he will come, Power and money him carried in chains power and money will return him free, He left his father land in slavery. He will come a blessing. But what has all this to do with the American Government recognizing us as an Independent Government? The United States Government the most despotic and sunken, the basest of all sovereignties, every man a king over a negro! The Government of the slave market. The Republic famous and infamous, for legislation of negroes. Ever scratching—growling—barking—blowing—and bullying over negroes—A country with a Negro God, a negro hell, Recognizing the independence of Liberia. Justus "says our hope is gone." No, no man, you are mistaken we never had any up this noble Old River, never wanted such a hope. I never could listen at the man that did, and always felt that he talked like Job's "foolish woman." Recognition from the United States? Let those who call us men recognize us, and those only. Is Justus crazy? Where could he have raised his preposterous ideas from? Men argue from cause to effect. But where Justus commenced and ended as he did, in disappointment I cannot tell. Our old natives say God made blackmen in the night, this may be true, and so may Justus's reasonable hope be. But when he founded this recognition hope, and upon what I know not when did the United States ever look on free Black men and declare them such. Where dream that a negro ought to be treated as a man—and freeman. In what age or place? Did Justus take his premises from the slave codes of the States? Those beautiful specimens of Liberty. Did he reason from the high prices of Negroes in the United States markets, and the rewards for Runaways? Did he take his stand near some negro auction where wives, husbands, and children, are examined teeth, and limb, knocked down to the highest bidder, with sheep, hogs, oxen, houses, goods and chattels, and carried off and separated as such? no more clearly drawn picture of the "Land of the Free and home of the brave" than this to contemplate was it from the tearing—bleeding—and tortures—of the "cowskin whip" the stripes of those bright stars of boasted Liberty? Or was it from the deep revery in which he fell, contemplating the last magnificent splendid, glorious and far famed monument, whose base covers that Union, whose foundations reach hell itself, and whose proud top crowned with great Webster reaches heaven—to receive the better, the thunders of the almight God, I mean the "Fugitive slave law," the beauty of the declaration of American Independence. This I confess was enough to bring him out somewhere. What! The United States declare ten thousand an Independant nation, who fled to Africa for Liberty, while three millions and a half are held in her Iron Grasp in a slavery, unheard of in the annals of the world! Threemillions in manacles, as unable to fly as the inmates of Sing Sing Prison? Such a recognition would come with ill grace. Let America Free herself. Wash her hand of negro blood, and begin by appropriating two or three millions of dollars to colonization. But let her keep her degrading and insulting recognition of us as she has done.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, JUNE 21st, 1854.

Commerce. The commercial department of Liberia is becoming of increased interest, and to leave this department of our relations unnoticed in this number of our paper would be treating amiss those of our fellow Citizens who by their honest endeavors seem quite anxious to develope this branch of buisiness and make its respectability keep pace with the other improvements which are going on. There is not the least doubt but that many will excel—and make the profession profitable to the enterprising. Nothing tends more to the prosperity of a people than to see the true spirit of enterprize awakening in their midst, this has heretofore in a great degree been the failing of our people; but from present appearances of industry—our hopes have been elevated—and our conclusion is that the destiny of Liberia is in the hands of her own Citizens and upon them depend her weal or woe—Yet this is an idea that has never been viewed rightly by the majority of the intelligent portion of our people.

HON: D. T. HARRISS

Died at his residence on the 14th inst Hon: D. T Harriss.—Occasions of this kind call for especial notice—when from amongst a people as we are, who are in need of the services of men of ability—one and another of our valuable citizens are taken away by the hand of death—man is dissoluble—man is mortal—man is corruptible—all matter is subject to decay—how far above the comprehension of man is the All wise decree of a munificent and All—wise being in whose judgments there is no error—The subject of this notice immigrated to this country in October 1848. Since which time he has occupied station after station in the Government; and the one last occupied by him of which we have notice, is that of Representative for the County of Massurado. Honor to the ashes of the worthy—May his and the names of former departed statesmen live with respectability in our memory.

It is with increased interest that we notice the growing thriftiness of our citizens. The handi of the shipbuilders and mechanics in every department of their profession including the husbandman—the product of whose labor appears in our market, show the rapid increase of the industry of our people. Indeed to an observant mind, who has watched particularly the increase of this people for the last ten years—it will unequivocally appear that Liberia now, is not the Liberia of ten years ago. This idea may to some be a novelty from the fact of man being an improving creature; but without the pale of this negative conclusion. Consider reader for a while of the material of which Liberia is composed—of her many unparalled vicisitudes owing to the depressed and abject condition of the majority of the immigrants filling up and making the great nucleus of her population—people generally of but little or no political information—and from among them—Legislators—Magistrates and all other civil functionaries have to be taken. Now under these circumstances who can gainsay Liberia in her feeble efforts—at the same time so many important results follow, to raise her christian civil and moral character. Indeed we are not only cared for by the zealous christian philanthropists—but He who is the fountain of philanthropy is our guide and director, and let us be encouraged fellow citizens to go anew to work—and our prosperity and elevation as a people and nation is certain—Teach virtue in the order of government, exemplify it in the management of society and our success will be certain.

ENGLAND.

By Mail Steamer "Forerunner, we have papers from England of the 16 ulto: There seems to be now no probability of the eastern question being settled without the shedding of blood. The Emperor Nicholas, will not agree to such terms as England and France have proposed, but is making every arrangement, to meet the consequences, of the most gigantic character. The allies are not behind him in the magnitude of their Naval and land arrangements. Turkey we must confess, possesses more abundant resources than we had supposed. It is said that England never sent off, a more powerful fleet, then the one now in the Baltic under the command of the celebrated Sir: Charles Napier. It cannot belong before active measures will commence. No regular battle had been fought—Still however, all has not been peace as will be seen from the following extract from the Illustrated London News—"From the accounts which have been received of the bombardment of Odessa it appears that twenty six vessels of the combined fleet arrived before Odessa on the 17th: ult: and that the bombardment of the city commenced on the following day and lasted one hour only. On the 22nd (last saturday week) the allied fleets destroyed, in a few hours all the fortifications, the batteries, and military stores. Two powder-magazines blew up, and twelve vessels of war were sunk. The merchant-vessels were saved. The loss of the Allies was only eight killed and eighteen wounded."

"Thirteen Russian vessels laden with munitions were taken."

"The fleet left in the direction of Sebastopol."

"Another despatch says, the Russian fleet had sailed out of Sebastopol, and advanced against the Allied fleet, but that, on a portion of the British navy showing battle, the Russian squadron prudently retreated to its stronghold."

"The shameful outrage committed by the garrison at Odessa on the boat from the Furious with a flag of truce, appears to have led to the bombardment of the city, as the following extract from a report addressed to the Minister of Marine by Vice-Admiral Hamelin, Commandant-in-Chief of the French squadron in the Black sea, dated on board the Ville de Paris, at the anchorage of Batschi April 10th, would lead us to infer:—

The English steam—frigate Furious went on the 6th of this month to Odessa, to claim the Consuls and such of our subjects as might wish to leave the place at the approach of hostilities with Russia. The Furious arrived here yesterday; and in throwing your eye over the report of the Captain of that frigate, your Excellency will see that, notwithstanding the flag of truce which she has hoisted and which her boat also carried, the batteries of Odessa—the number of which has of late been very considerably increased—treacherously fired seven cannon—shot on the boat a few minutes after she had left the quay and the maritime authorities. This is a proceeding without example in the history of the wars of civilized nations. It is necessary to go back to 1829—the period at which the Dey of Algiers did the same by the Provence line-of-battle ship (and this was a line of battle ship)—in order to find a similar fact: in other words, we must seek an example in a war with barbarians. Admiral Dundas and I are about to concert the severe measures which are called for by such a proceeding."

UNITED STATES.

By the bark "Shirley" Capt: G. S. Hall of Baltimore, we received a number of American papers. They contain no news that can particularly interest our Liberian readers. The usual items of mobs, house—breakings and other ill doings occupy conspicuous places in them. All kinds of american produce are at high prices. Freight to Liberia is higher than we ever knew it to be.

Congress have had under consideration the "Nebraska Bill"—the object of which, is to extend the accursed system of slavery. Most of our readers are informed as to the character of this Bill, as long before we heard of it directly from the U. S.—English papers had enlightened them on the subject. As far as we can learn, the bill has not passed into a law, and we hope, for the sake of humanity, and from the fear every body ought to have, who constantly insults the God of the oppressed, that it will never pass. A distinguished statesman of America, when speaking of the institution of American slavery, is said to have said—"when I consider the justice of God I tremble for my country." Many of the sayings and doings of the great statesmen of that time are continually being harped upon by the democratic party in the U. S. and almost all of their acts are put forth, as having been favored and sanctioned by the great Father of Democracy,—we allude to Thomas Jefferson. How is it, that his admirers—in this day and time, do not keep continually before them, his opinions in regard to slavery? Why should they so anxiously desire to extend slavery through their favored land! It is not too much to hope, that the good and pious of the northern states will present a bold and steady front in opposition to this slavery extension, and so use their influence, as to make congress dare to sanction such an outrageous crime? Will the good people sit still, and witness the destruction of the Missouri compromise, for the benefit only of the slave owners—irresponsible despots, whom no laws restrain? And how long can it be supposed, that the God of Heaven will continue to delay his judgments upon the heads of those who oppress his creatures—made in his own image?

Mr. Herald.

The subject of our foreign relations, is now becoming a topic of peculiar importance, and although it may at first sight, seem strange to many, and create some surprise, that such a subject should for a moment need any speculation, nevertheless, the subject, of, how far the intercourse of foreigners with Liberia, in their commercial relations, should be permitted to extend, where treaty stipulations do not regulate them, is one, that is causing much speculation, and upon which many opinions have been advanced. England, France, Prussia, Belgium and Brazil have recognized Liberia as an independent soverign state; and the two first named powers have made treaties with Liberia, regulating commercial relations &c &c. Most certainly the arrangements now subsisting between the people of Liberia and those powers, are recognized as permanent laws, and the people of Liberia, allways faithful to their obligations, will never first entertain the idea of infringing any of their provisions. But the question now is, shall Liberia invite other powers to enter into commercial relations with it? On every hand an opinion is expressed, decidedly in the negative, and unless we are very much mistaken, it is not the wish of the people of Liberia that other powers be asked to acknowledge the independence of Liberia. It must not be inferred from what we have said, that the Liberians have a wish to be friends with the entire civilized world, we mean nothing of the kind, and do not wish to be so understood. What we mean to say is this that the people of Liberia will scarcely ever consent to any treaty which may hereafter be proposed, containing stipulations, like those of England and France. No treaty of same tenor, can be ratified by the senate. The people will object—loudly object against any such treaty. It is not to the advantage of the people of Liberia that such treaties should be made and as "self preservation is the first law of nature," the people of Liberia will in all such cases, imperative, insist upon this old saying in all matters, which immediately effect their interest. And who is it in the whole world that will blame them? Surely none that the good people of christendom, would for a moment loose their time in talking. Yours LITTGANS.

POETRY.

"ALL THY WORKS PRAISE THEE."

BY MARY HOWITT.

The moonbeams on the billowy deep,
The blue waves rolling on the strand,
The ocean in its peaceful sleep,
The shell that murmurs on the sand,
The cloud that dims the bending sky,
The bow that on its bosom glows,
The sun that lights the vault on high,
The stars at midnight's calm repose;
These praise the Power that arched the sky,
And robed the earth in beauty's dye.

The melody of nature's choice,
The deep toned anthems of the sea,
The wind that tunes a viewless lyre,
The zephyr on its pinions free,
The thunder with its thrilling notes,
The peal upon the mountain air,
The lay that through the foliage floats,
Or sinks in dying cadence there;
These all to thee their voices raise,
A fervent song of gushing praise.

The day-star, herald of the dawn,
As the dark shadows flit away,
The tint upon the cheek of morn,
The dew-drop gleaming on the spray—
From wild birds in their wanderings,
From streamlets leaping to the sea,
From all earth's fair and lovely things,
Doth living praise ascend to Thee;
These with their silent tongues proclaim
The varied wonders of thy name.

Father, thy hand hath formed the flower,
And flung it on the verdant leaf;
Thou hadst it ope at summer's hour,
Its hues of beauty speak of Thee.
Thy works all praise thee; shall not man
Alike attune the grateful hymn?
Shall he not join the loftier strain,
Echoed from heart of seraphim?
We true to Thee our humble lays,
Thy mercy, goodness, love, we praise.

How some people live in Paris.

A gossipping correspondent of the New York Daily Times gives us the following insight to certain classes in Parisian life:

The Wakers Wakeresses—for none but women follow this profession—are individuals whose occupation it is to rouse from sleep at an early hour such persons as have business at the market, and must be there betimes. Their wages are two sous a morning for each subscriber roused. It seems strange that a profession like this should require any particular aptitude or capability, but it has been found that one woman will wake her customers in just half the time required by another. In times gone by, when the people lived huddled together in the immediate vicinity of the Halles, a good reveilleure would wait upon fifteen or twenty subscribers every morning, and thus earn thirty or forty sous before day-break. But now that the Rue de Rivoli has pierced the quarter, its denizens have been dispersed and the wakeresses find it impossible to serve more than half a dozen customers a day. The trade is falling into disuse.

The Eye-Witness is a man who lives by crime—not by that which he commits himself, but by that perpetrated by others. The moment he hears of a murder, or any catastrophe of that sort, he immediately repairs to the scene of the affair, says he knows all about it, picks up all the details he can find, adds to them, recounts it over a dozen times, gets a sort of notoriety as the individual 'that was there when it happened,' leaves his name and address at the nearest wine shop, and awaits the effect. The examining judge hears of this well-informed gentleman, and in view to elucidate the case, has him at once sent for. He comes, and is sworn, and makes a total irrelevant deposition: he tells what somebody else said that he thought a third person had imagined, and what he guessed was the motive of the quarrel. Beyond that he can throw no light upon the affair. But he has earned his two francs—the wages of every witness summoned to testify—and by his earnings in this way lives.

The second hand witness hangs about the palace of justice and as gentlemen who have testified come from the various audience rooms, he asks them if they mean to draw their two francs; if they do not, he supplicates them, for the love of God and for sympathy with a wife and the usual number of children, to pass over to him the paper entitling the bearer to the two francs in question. The second-hand witness makes hazhazard money enough in this way to live precariously, and die in the hospital.

The guardian-angel is a man whose duty it is to frequent the drinking shops, and the moment a man gets tipsy, to take him under his protection, to accompany him home and put him to bed. The individuals practising this profession are picked men—men who never drink themselves—who have the necessary moral authority to force obedience from the drunken creature they are conveying home—who can defend him against attack, and more than all, who can prevent him from drinking at the shops they pass on their way. The price for this service is ten sous; and there is not an instance on record of an individual thus protected home and put to bed having failed to discharge this debt of honor. It is a rule at the drinking shops, that when a man cannot stand, he must be taken off, and the angel is straightway called. The angels are kindly treated by the shopkeepers, whose interest it is that no one of his customers come to harm. They receive the odds and ends of the dinner, and are recommended to the neighbors when a reliable man for some confidential errand is wanted. Their honesty is proverbial, and a bacchanalian with a hundred francs in his pocket, who is confided to their charge, is morally sure of finding his hundred francs where he left them, when he wakes the next morning.

A rich tippler, late deceased, who spent the last year of his life in drinking blue wine at the barrier, left in his will a thousand francs to each of the guardian angels who alternately conducted him home after his nightly potations at the Watering-pot of Mountmatre.

It may safely be said that not one person out of a hundred of the inhabitants of Paris is aware of the existence of such modes of obtaining a living. The writer of the feuilleton I have abridged, says that he has learned to be surprised at nothing, and that, it he were told that there are people who earn their bread by making tooth-picks out of old moons, he should accept the narrative with equanimity, and believe it without fanaticism.

The prefect of police has forbidden winesellers to have Voltaic piles upon their counters for the amusement of their customers as one accident has already happened, and as others would be likely to follow, were the practice continued.

COMING EVENTS.—The coming year bids fair to transcend 1848 in events of momentous and universal interest. According to present appearances the whole Continent is likely to be again involved in the conflagration of a general war—not simply between the unarmed and undisciplined people and their mailed oppressors, but between great nations, themselves the representatives respectively of Freedom and Despotic power. The great issues which the events of many years have been preparing, seems at last to have been joined—and the final contest is at hand. Happily, our country is too remote to be directly affected by the incidents of this great collision:—but it is near enough to sympathize with Freedom and Right, and to tend them such efficient aid as may be given with advantage to the cause and without injury to ourselves.—An America. Paper.

THE ANCIENT LEVITICAL CITIES.—The Rev. Dr. Croly, the well known author, recently writing on the subject of a park projected for Finsbury, one of the London boroughs, points out as remarkable, "that in the divine allotment of the cities of Israel, this provision was distinctly made in the forty-eight cities of the Levites, of a circle of open ground surrounding each city of a thousand cubits breadth, probably for gardens and fruits, and an exterior circle of two thousand cubits more, called the 'fields of the suburbs,' for pasture, and, of course, recreation, both forming a large space, which was expressly forbidden to be encroached on in any sale of dwellings or alienation of property. 'That the fields of the suburbs of their perpetual possession.' (Lev. xxv. 34)

"We are to remember also, that this especial provision for health was made in the midst of a nation almost wholly agricultural, already sitting under its vine and its fig-tree, and singularly exempted from those drudgeries which in latter times shut up men in infected air, and mulct generations of half the life of man."Am: paper.

A DEATH-BED REVELATION

A LARGE wine-dealer residing in London, recently, on his death-bed, being in great distress of mind, acknowledged to his friends that his agony was occasioned by the nature of the business he had followed for years. He stated that it had been his habit to purchase all the sour wines he could, and by making use of sugar of lead, and other deleterious substances, to restore the wine to a palatable taste. He said he did not doubt he had been the means of destroying hundreds of lives, as he had from time to time noticed the injurious effect of his mixtures on those who drank them. He had seen instances of this kind where the unconscious victims of his cupidity after wasting and declining for years despite the best medical advice, went to their graves, poisoned by the adulterated wines he had sold them.

This man died rich; but, alas, what a legacy did he leave his children! Wealth gotten by deceit, and that not of a harmless, but fatal nature.

Present dealers in intoxicating poisons! you have got to die too. Do you not see how the wine fabricator, whose confession is recorded above, on his death-bed felt the deepest remorse for what he had done? Fly then from a traffic so horrible! You all know your drinks are shamefully adulterated by the most fatal drugs. Your know they are poisoning and demoralizing to all who drink them. Law makers, is it not time you should put your strong seal of condemnation on a traffic so wicked? If you do not, but permit this crying sin to go on, are you not parties in the terrible guilt incurred?—The Prohibitionist.

LUCKY AND UNLUCKY DAYS

The belief in lucky and unlucky days is one of the prevalent of human superstitions. There are traces of it among all the nations of antiquity, and some of more recent date.—The 14th day of the first month was esteemed auspicious by the Jews, because it ended their captivity in Egypt. On the other hand, the 10th of August was ill-omend; for on that day the first temple was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and the second by Titus, six hundred years after. The Romans would never undertake any business on the 13th of February, (Dies Alliensis) which was the anniversary of the battle of Allia, when the nation was almost annihilated by the Gauls. The Carthagenians had the same superstition about the 22nd of August. Louis XI of France esteemed it an evil omen if any one spoke to him on business on Innocents' Day.

There have been some remarkable coincidences of days in the lives of distinguished men. The same day of the month has not unfrequently been the day of birth and of death, and the date of some memorable event. Alexander the Great was born on the 6th of April. On that day he won two of his most important victories, and on that day he died. On that day, his father, Philip, conquered Potidea, and on that day, Parmenio, Philip's General, overcame the Illyrians. Pompey the Great was born and died on the 30th of September, and on the same day triumphed on his return from Asia. Augustus was adopted by Julius Cæsar on the 19th of August he died. The wife of Henry VII. was born and died on the 11th of February, Sir Kenelm Digby was born and died on the 11th of June—He conquered at Scandaroon on the same day. His epitaph commemorates the coincidence:

"Under this stone the matchless Digby lies,
Digby the great, the valiant, and the wise;
This age's wonder for his noble parts,
Skilled in six tongues, and learned in all the arts;
Born on the day he died—the eleventh of June—
On which he bravely fought at Scandaroon.
'Tis rare that one and self same day should be
His day of birth, of death, of victory."

Raffaele was born and died on Good Friday. Shakspeare's birth day was also the day of his death—April 23d. The 24th of Febuary was twice memorable to Charles V. of Spain, as the day of his birth, the day of his victory over Francis, King of France, and the day on which he received the imperial crown at Bonoma.—Charles II. of England was born and restored to the throne on the 29th of May. The 2d of September was marked in the history of Cromwell as the date of the victory at Dunbar, also of that at Worcester, and as the day of his death.

Days of the week have sometimes been signalized in a similar manner. Tuesday was a day of note to Becket, the english saint. On Tuesday the Jews passed judgment on him at Northampton, on Tuesday he went into exile, on Tuesday he had a vision in which his doom was foretold him, on Tuesday he returned from exile, on Tuesday he died, and on Tuesday was canonized. Wednesday was the lucky day of the celebrated Pope Sixtus V. It was the day of his birth, the day on which he took orders, the day on which he was made General of his order, the day on which he was elected Pope and the day on which he was inaugurated. Henry VII. called Saturday his fortunate day, as that on which he gained the battle of Bosworth, and that on which he entered London. It is remarkable that four of the Tudors in succession died on Thursday, beginning with Henry VIII. the second, and ending with Elizabeth, the last of the line.

Ancient calendars designate two days in each month as unfortunate, namely, of January, the first and seventh; Febuary, the third and fourth; March, the first and fourth; April the tenth and eleventh; May, the third and seventh; June, the tenth and fifteenth; July, the tenth and thirteenth; August, the first and second; September, the third and tenth; October, the third and tenth, November, the third and fifth; December, the seventh and tenth. Each of these days was devoted to some peculiar fatality. Whether the change of "style" introduced towards the close of the last century, by deranging the calendar order, has affected the character of these days, we are unable to say. For our own part, we agree with Heraclitus, who blamed Hesiod for calling some days lucky and others unlucky, as not discerning that "the nature of every day is the same." And we heartily subscribe to the saying of St. Paul, who after mentioning that "one man esteemeth one day above another, another esteemeth every day alike," adds, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind"—

HOW TO TREAT A WIFE.

First, get a wife; secondly, be patient. You may have great trials and perplexities in your business with the world, but do not, therefore carry to your home a clouded or contracted brow. Your wife may have many trials, which though of less magnitude, may have been as hard to bear. A kind, conciliating word, and manner, will do wonders in chasing from her brow all clouds of gloom. You encounter your difficulties in the open air; fanned by heaven's cool breezes; but your wife is often sent in from these healthful influences, and her health fails and her spirits lose their elasticity. But oh! bear with her; she has trials and sorrows to which you are a stranger, but which your tenderness can deprive of all their anguish. Notice kindly her little attentions and efforts to promote your comfort. Do not take them all as a matter of course, and pass them by, at the same time being very sure to observe any omission of what you may consider duty to you. Do not treat her with indifference, as if you would sear and palsy her heart, which watered by kindness, would, to the latest day of your existence, throb with sincere and constant affection. Sometimes yield your wishes to hers. She has preferences as strong as you and it may be just as trying to yield her choice as to you. Do you find it hard to yield sometimes? Think of it it is not difficult for her to give up always? If you never yield to her wishes, there is danger that she will think you are selfish, and care only for yourself; and with such feelings she can not love as she might. Again, show yourself manly, so that your wife can look up to you, and feel that you will not act rashly and that she can confide in your judgment.—J. C.

A NEW CALENDAR PROCLAIMED BY THE INSURGENTS IN CHINA.

THE North China Herald gives a proclamation by the Insurgent Chief in China of a new calendar. It is headed as the "Third year of the Celestial Dynasty of Thien Pung," and commences: "All high officers kneeling before our soverign and elder mother, the Celestial King, whom we wish to live for myriads of years added to myriads of years and myriads of years, report that we have prepared a calendar and fixed the seasons." This calendar makes every year to contain three hundred and sixty-six days, every odd month thirty one days, and every even month thirty days. Two seasons are, commencement of spring, beginning February 14; clear and bright season, beginning April 5; period of bearded grain, beginning June 6; commencement of autumn, August 8; season of cold dew, date not given; and season of great snow, December 7.

The editor of the North China Herald remarks of this new calendar, that it is undertaken to form a new division of the months, instead of that combination of solar and lunar which have existed from time immemorial. Each of their months consists of two solar terms, or one sign of the zodiac. They also make another error in making the solar year consist of three hundred and sixty six days every year, instead of once in four years. They also make their Saturday.

Another part of the proclamation, relative to lucky and unlucky days, is so replete with good sense that it may be read with profit even by some in our more civilized land:

"All the corrupt doctrines and perverted views of preceding dynasties are the result of the Devil's cunning devices to deceive and delude mankind; we, your Majesty's servants, have, therefore, set them aside, for the years, months, days and hours are all determined by our Heavenly Father; thus every year is lucky and favorable, every month is lucky and favorable, and every day as well as every hour is lucky and favorable; how can they be classified under good and bad, and what can be the use of selecting one period above another? Whenever truly venerates our Heavenly Father, the supreme Lord and great God, is under the protection of heaven, and can engage in his duties whenever he thinks proper; every season, therefore, may be considered as prosperous and favorable."—Boston Traveller.

LIBERIA HERALD.

AN APPEAL TO THE COL: SOC: &c.

Mr. Herald.

If I have not already obtruded myself too much upon your patience. Suffer me still to, as far as possible, and in this proper time, to clear my skirts of my brothers blood. We are our brothers keeper. And the subject is one that should interest all true friends of life of liberty, of Liberia, and of what we beleive is the design of God, the colonising of the Free colored people of the United States to this country, to give them that which they do not enjoy in that country, Freedom, and through them give the Gospel to Africa. I have said before that the colonisationists gave their means, I beleive, to accomplish in the most effectual manner, the end of colonization. Their design was not merely to send our brethren to this, "House of the Free," this rich and fertile land. They know the process of acclimation, of settleing, and the necessity of good health in settleing any new county, the dangers of relapse from unnecessary and uncalled for exposure. And we know when the Col: Soc: was younger, poorer, than now, when emigrants came to, but three places in what is now Messurado county. It was then found necessary, to have at Monrovia four emigrant houses, Caldwell four, I know; Millsburg one, then composing all the settlements of this Republic. Some of those houses 25 by 120 ft, the timber and boards, purchased cheap and sent out from lumber yards in the U. S., Doctors room, and emigrant store, in, I beleive each settlement, and an adequate, medical force to meet the demand of the emigrant through the fever. This was just as it should be, I do say, an adequate medical force is greatly needed, and it is not in Liberia

I do say, that emigrants ought to go, and settle in those towns, and farming districts, that they purposed to settle in, at once.

I do say, that emigrants houses should be in each of the receiving settlements, for the accomodation of emigrants during the acclimating process, as was once provided a good many years ago, and until these are furnished, and medical men, with human souls in them are provided, in sufficient force, the Col, Soc, will hear of death, all needless of apologies and charges, of imprudence, &c &c on men who must bestir themselves in the six months, or die afterwards, notwithstanding. Suffer me in this to speak of a sufficient medical force &c.

Their are now five settlements in Messurado Co, that receive emigrants, Monrovia, Caldwell, Virginia, Clay ashland, and Millsburg. One half of all coming to this Republic Clay ashland and Virginia alone probably one third. These settlements are scattered over a space of country; from what is now called Carolina (alias) Harrisville (alias) the settlement at Goliah Favs, (see map of Liberia) to Martial, I will ask in the name of humanity can Dr. H. J. Roberts attend to them.? Even if in cases of great necessity Dr. Moore is employed? These two composing all the medical force of this country to attend them?

With increasing private practice, can they do it? Some one must attend to individuals, who are not emigrants, that grow sick. And in a population native and american, all increasing their will be sickness any where out of Heaven.

Whole ships crews, coming into ports must be attended to also. The present medical force is not sufficient by one third. And benevolent individuals are paying to educate school teachers &c &c: and if this matter was fully investigated would not men be found in America & England who would come foward, and educate medical men? as so much depends upon it, than in good earnest take young men, youth of this Republic and educate them? Falling as it does in the very train of Philanthrophy, Colonization, and general good, to the whole cause, in all the instrumentalities effecting it. When did Liberia get so free of want? When acclimation cease? Truly the country as it is being opend along our River is becoming more healthy. But will, and can all Emigrants halt on the River? There are not five vacant lots now from the beach to Millsburg over twenty miles, back roads are being opened and settled and it is found men must acclimate settle where they will.

Their is Grand Bassa, in a like predicament with three or four settlement receiving emigrants can Dr. Smith attend all as he should? Private Practice, and calls from the sea &c &c: And is there any medical man at Sinoe County with five settlements receiving one third of all the emigrants coming to Liberia? private practice needed? No, not one, Smith must fly from it to Bassa and from Bassa to it over all measured, no doubt, two hundreed miles!!! Tant county alone would busisly employ three medical men and Bassa as many. Should Liberia be blamed if any die! I once thought our doctors an idle set of men and made the charge, until close observation convinced me they were not quite omnipresent especially where the Physician has not sufficient medicine with all this As Dr. J. M. Moore late Doctor to emigrants to the settlement on the river complained and emigrants scattered any where, and every where the diligent agent Mr. Dennis, could possible get house room. Now most of our settlements are from three to five miles long Doctors have no houses and must foot and boat. Through Caldwell, through Virginia through Millsburg, Over Monrovia. I must plead not guilty to the charge of idleness, once made upon these men. And ask why are they not dead and buried long ago themselves. How do they as much they do! Even if Houses, "long Houses" in the settlements were so erected that they could meet some forty or fifty emigrants at once, who should be visited at least once a day, it would cost much less in a few years than house rent. The Assylum too near the ground, the floor and Virginia need another house now 24 by 150 feet and framed houses, are the most healthy, timber could be shiped I believe cheaper than procured on the ground, Clayashland need two such houses. One in Town and one on the beautiful Johnsons avanue intended, to be fifteen miles long—and one hundred feet wide, running out of Clayashland to New Port inferior, which avanue is now being settled. Millsbury and Harrisville needs houses. Besides all this houses sufficient cannot be united in any settlement, and people whose whole mind is on one settlement, must settle in another, and in effect loose the benefit of the chief end of the provision of six months that is made by Col. Soc. And it is this latter business that has a Grave Yard attached to it, yes it has. As God willing I will attempt to show in my next.

Clayashland.

A. F. RUSSEL.

☞ The Nebraska bill, by Senator Douglass; could any thing equal it in atrocity and infamy? It is not the very scum and dublings of the pit? could Satan himself have devised a scheme more cruel, diabolical, hellish? Why is it? On whom rests the guilt of condemnation? Pro slavery churches, ministers of the sanctuary, supporters of the Fugitive Bill, American Board, Sunday School Union, American Tract Society, and Bible Society; have you any thing to say on this point? Is there no blood guiltiness attached to your skirts? Had you come out boldly in the cause of the oppressed, think you this foul stain would now be resting upon us? never, never! Instead of lifting your voice, you have either held your peace, or hugged the accursed monster, embraced him—you have cherished the serpent in your bosom—received the price of blood into your treasury. And now the voice of your brother's blood crieth!'

O what an avalanche of iniquity rests upon the pro-slavery churches, ministers, and ecclesiastical bodies! With a voice of seven THUNDERS! we would say to every soul that fears God, 'come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.' Rev. 18 4.—The Golden Rule.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald—Will you allow us a space in your columns to make a few remarks in relation to certain opinions advanced in an editorial of your last number?

The article in question discusses a very important subject viz "Emcation as indispensably necessary to the Stability of the Republic"—This is a fact so obvious that a blind man will not dispute it, though he may not see it—he will certainly stumble against it,—But, Mr. Herald how does it happen that you object to the idea that Missionary Schools such as are now in operation in Liberia are adequate to raise men competent to uphold and conduct the government? You ask. "Can it be said that missionary schools are likely to send forth men capable of taking charge of the government—to carry it on as it should be?"—And then you remark—"We unhesitatingly reply in the negative—and it is with fear and trembling that we are compelled to come to this conclusion"—Well may you have come to the conclusion in such a manner, for it is, according to our impression, rather a hasty one.

We are decidedly of the opinion that the schools now in the Republic will send forth men qualified in a very respectable degree to take charge of the government in all its departments. It is not a fact that in all the schools the young men are educated exclusively with a view to missionary operations—We do not believe that all the young men in the Alex: High School—(of which we know more than we do of any other)—are being trained for the ministry.

We are acquainted with two of the students who are studying with a view to the practice of law—with another studying with reference to medical pursuits. We know of but two who have the ministry in view—Though the fact cannot be concealed and should not be, that the Liberian Church is just as much in need of educated men as the State.—

You ask further Mr. Herald, "What is to be done under these circumstances? Can Liberia continue to exist in the absence of necessary schools to educate the rising generation?" By these interrogations, it appears Sir, you leave the impression that there are no "necessary Schools" in the Republic. But is this the fact? Are not the Schools now existing or some of them at least as good and fully as adequate to produce educated men as any the government might establish had it the means to do so? Surely they are—But the objection seems to be —they are Missionary Schools. Well supposing they are! Are not Liberians, strictly speaking a missionary community! Was it not a part of the avowed object of the founders of this nation [illegible] of introducing christianity and civilization into this continent? and is not this now strenuously urged as one of the greatest pleas in behalf of Liberia by her friends abroad? Is it not right therefore—is it not true to found the education of those who in future are to come forward and sustain the government, upon the holy principles of the Bible? Is it not proper to inspire them with high regard for those truths which are a nations safe guard—and under the influence of which alone true national prosperity and greatness are promoted?

The perplexity with us, Mr. Herald, has always been, not so much that the means of education are lacking as that there are so few who appreciate the facilities within their reach, some there are who indulging a foolish pride,—(and ignorance and pride go together) despise the idea of being educated by missionary societies and are therefore remaining in ignorance—satisfied with merely earning sufficient to keep themselves from panperism—We know some young men in this community of fine natural talents who, if they would practice a little self denial—and embrace the advantages held out to them in some of these schools might become brilliant ornaments and efficient supporters of our Republic: but they look only to the present they regard not the future. This being the state of things then—if instruction is now despised when it may be obtained under circumstances so favorable, is it likely that it would be appreciated, if schools were established by the government entirely detached from missionary operations? We cannot assure ourselves that it would, Yet it is certain that if the people are not educated, "Liberia as a Republic cannot stand" for such is the increase and such the character of immigrations that in few years the country will be deluged in a flood of ignorance which will, in its powerful flow, unless there be a sufficient counteracting influence bear away our free institutions arrest the progress of the rising nation—and render our beloved land a scene of discord and tyranny—And here I may, be permitted to state my honest conviction that so long as this stat of things continues, Liberia cann of fully meet the expectation of her friends abroad in exerting a redeeming and recuperative influence upon the surrounding natives—excepting perhaps so far as her example and authority may operate upon them—She will always have enough to do to suppress and counteract the demoralizing & degenerating influence of ignorance among her own citizens, It is impossible to disguise the fact that emigrations to Liberia from the U. S. are generally composed of persons not at all calculated to assume the duties and responsibilities of citizens of a free government,—and therefore much less qualified to redeem a continent—persons who, having spent the greater portion of their lives in servile situations, if not in hard bondage are themselves barely civilized. If Liberians then would see their country prosper,—if they would see her a advance to national importance. If they would not see her dissevered into a thousand pieces—and become an object of scorn to the world—a reproach to the entire colored race —If they would see Africa "elevated redeemed and disenthralled" they must inspire their children with a sense of the importance of knowledge —teaching them that in efficiency it is "Power" and in value above the price of rubies—and therefore should be appreciated and striven after whoever and by whomsoever proffered.

Before we conclude. Mr. Herald we beg to say that you must not—from the foregoing remarks understand us as slighting your advice that "the people of Liberia must help themselves &c.

We sincerely believe and constantly advocate the doctrine of true independence, but this should not induce us to refuse or neglect offered aid, especially when we are in need of it. It is the part of wisdom to accept of and appreciate it. We would not regard a man in indigent circumstance as wise who, on the ground, that he must be independent would refuse assistance tendered to him,—such conduct would be extremely foolish and the man would be deserving of no sympathy. Let us then while we endeavor to maintain a proper spirit of independence—not slight assistance from abroad—

Monrovia July 10th 1854.

ALEXANDRIAN.

Mr. Herald.

I noticed in your last issue, a very protracted effusion under the Caption of "An appeal to the C. S. U. S. A. The Emigrant, his condition and his wants."

Having perused it carefully several times, I must confess that I was very much disappointed in the article. Its caption had inspired me with large expectations, as to its contents. While it brings many important facts to light it is strangely indefinite in its conclusions;—and wonderfully inconsistent with itself. The writer proceeds—increasing his details of the wants and sufferings of Emigrants—and after having elicited the sympathy of his readers in behalf of the sufferers. and excited their indignation against those, who are the causes of such suffering—he contrives in some way to exculpate from censure all concerned.

The Physicians, upon whose efforts the welfare of the Emigrants greatly depends, he says," "are as active as circumstances will admit," this being the case, they cannot be blamed for any sufferings of the Emigrants.

The Agent, upon whom the duty of locating the Emigrants and otherwise providing for their health and confort devolves, is said to be, "a humane and active young man &c &c" Then of course it is to be presumed he does his duty, and is therefore not censurable.

After a few more details, the writer, asks, "Who will blame the Col. Soc:"? We do not believe they know this,"—The blame then you will perceive, Mr. Herald, according to the writer, cannot rest on the Physicians, nor on the Agent, nor on the Society;—it must fall therefore upon the Emigrants themselves. they must be reproached as the causes of their own sufferings; but this cannot be either, since the writer intimates, that they are not furnished with the means necessary for their confort and safety. Where then is the blame? Why nowhere. Who then is censurable? Why nobody. But is this really a fact? Has the writer succeeded in his obvious design of exonerating all from blame? No.—It were absured to suppose he had. Indeed he does by implication censure the Agent and Physicians after all.

He says "I live on the St. Pauls River, on the right and left and before me are settleing probably one half of the Emigrants to this Republic. And every Emigrant Agent, and every Doctor lives at Monrovia from 10 to 14 and 20 miles from the places at which emigrants come to settle. increasing I believe the one class in mercantile engagements, and the other in extended private practice in and out of that City. "I speak for Messurado County, I simply in this state fact." The distributive pronoun "Every" which the writer applies to Agent, would imply that there were more than one or even two Emigrant Agents in this County who have the oversight of Emigrants located on the St. Pauls river. I am, I believe, the only Agent of the A. C. S. for this County, and the only one who locates Emigrants on the St. Pauls. But I, whom the writer discribes as "a humane and and active Young Man &c &c"—He says, "am increasining in mercantile engagements. This I must say with all due respect to the Hon: and Rev Gentleman, is a departure from strict varacity. It is generally known here that I am engaged in no business but that of the Society's, and I wish that my Hon friend would be more particular in his remarks, and always fully inform himself of facts before he makes assertions.

But the others, namely, the Physicians he says, "are increasing in extended private practice &c"—These however the writer excuses, as he advances,—on the ground that they are bound by the laws of humanity and of God to practice privately as well as attend emigrants" —If such be the case why complain to the Col: Soc! If it be wrong for the two Physicians we have in this County to give their entire attention to the Emigrants during their acclimation, (which I well know they do not.) I ask again, why complain to the Society?—Both of these Physicians alluded to, were for the last six months employed by the society to attend Emigrants, one on the St Pauls, and the other in Monrovia. The one who was employed to attend on the St. Pauls neglected to render proper attention to his Patients, by this, I mean that he would not remain up the river among them, but spent during the six months no little part of his time and practice in this city. It being impossible to obtain the services of any other physician, wewere obliged, after some very impleasant words with him about his unfaithfulness, to suffer him to continue, notwithstanding his partial attendance, as it was better than none. This Mr. Herald is generally known here, and many parties have complained to me of the bad medical attention rendered Emigrants on the St. Pauls. I believe the writer is willing to admit that he has seen me often in his vicinity visiting Emigrants, and from the conversation I had with him at his dwelling during one of those visits a few months ago about the bad medical attention rendered them, he cannot but believe that I have not so much neglected them, as he intimates by remarking, that "I am increasing in mercantile engagements" at Monrovia.

The fact is, Mr. Herald, we greatly need more Physicians, not only in this county but in the other Counties. The entire number of Phsicians that we now have in all the Republic being only four; of these, three were educated and graduated in the United States through the instrumentality of the Col. Soc. and I believe at their expens.

And they would doubtless employ Physicians in the States and send them among us, could they be obtained, but we are well aware of the antipathy which talented colored men in that country entertain against Liberia.—consequently it is not to be expected that the services of any qualified colored Physician would be secured—But however this may be, is it not high time for us, as an independent people, to endeavor to help ourselves in this respect? I think we ought to look within ourselves a little and endeavor to devise some plan to remedy the many evils of which some now complain to the Society.

"There cant be so much smoke without fire," There is blame some where, and our Hon Writer residing amidst the suffering, and the dying should have had sufficient candour to have been more explicit. If this state of things is as he represents? If there has existed, and still exists, a want of suitable houses for the accommodation of Emigrants, this fact should have been made known to the Society, by their agent and If he has not done this, (his indispensable duty)—then he is no longer the "humane and active" being which he is said to be by the writer—& for this failure in his duty is highly censurable.

But as a proof that the Soc. has been properly informed on this point, I beg to call the writer's attention to a published letter of mine in the New York Col. Journal addressed to the Rev. Jno. B Pinney Secy. N Y. S. Col. Soc. the early part of last year, theperusal of which. I believe will convince him of this fact. I might, Mr. Herald, notice the assertions made by the writer about Medicines, stinking Fish beef, Pork &c but deem it unnecessary at present they are mere assertions destitute of proper foundations. My only reason for thus far noticing the "appeal" is, that "I want every man to shoulder his own luggage;" to lay the blame where it belongs: and I would request the writer in his "next" to which he makes reference—not only to give "proof that will convict and burn" but to come to the "point" without dodging and equivocating.

H. W. Dennis.

Mr. Editor;—Having been called upon by distinguished citizens. Legislature, and matter of our republic, in your last number, give a candid statement in reference to the emigrants at the receptible during the last six months ending June the 20th. I proceed to do so. The receptible is one story and a garret, containing 14 rooms below, 8 by 10 feet two of which, are occupied as store rooms, which from the cakage of brine, from beef, pork, and fish barrels, and also molasses, which cause an impleasent odor, throughout the building. There is also 4 rooms in the garret. The passage is about 6 feet wide and the floor about 2 feet from the ground, with no ventilation to my knowledge The floor is open freely admiting the air from beneath into the building. Their is no regular bedstead, as a general thing, many of the emigants lie on the floor. The number of persons in each room, may be estimated at about 5 or 6 (i e) in some 2 or 3. and in others 9 or 10. In one room besides the occupants are barrels, boxes, cooking utensils, beds, and more to be deplored than all, is their weeks provision. viz pork, beef, salt fish, corn meal, molasses, sugar, coffee, tea, flour rice, sometimes, butter, sweet potatoes, and other vegetables, all crowded under the bed, the space left unoccupied may be judged of, from the descriptive size of the rooms. The ground around and about the house is low and level, therefore the first to accumulate an over flow of water in time of rain, from the fact that their is a high ominence on the south west side of the house, and on the north east a creek, consequently the location, is the last from which the water is drained. The dampness under the house togeth-er with the decomposition of vegetable, and animals, matter contained in the house, fills the whole building with foul air, which has a delitterious affect upon the human economy. Atmospheric impurity is an abundant source of disease, carbonic acid, carbonic oxeide, the different forms of carburetted hydrogen, hydro-sulphuric, acid, and sulphurous acid, are almost all that proceed from natural sources or ordinary artificial process, in quantities likely to prove injurious to health, others, such as, chlorine, muriatic acid gas, nitric oxid, or nitrous acid vapour, &c &c. but besides these numerous aeriform products, are constantly evolved, by vegetable, and animal exhalation, causes wich tend to contaminate the air, and render it more or less noxious to animal life, from the decomposition of vegetable and animal matters, in and about the receptacle, with the dampness arising, & (I may also say, from the filthy, and crowded condition, of the inmates.) those deliterious affects, can clearly be discovered therein, during acclimation, to the extent of asphyxia, cerebral oppression, fainting, comma, and dimness sometimes even to the extinction, of burning tapers. These are facts, which I hope no one will pretend to denie. During my attention to the emigrants. I strove to get a committee to examine the receptacle, but failed to succeed. Indeed all the emigrants in the Virginia settlements, were uncomfortably situated, being 5 or 6 crammed into one room, together with their provisions Those in Clay Ashland where the mortality was small, were more comfortably situated. As for proper medical aid, the last emigrant did not get, it was impossible, under all the circumstances, I wish it to be understood, that the emigrant were scattered from the intersection of St Pauls river, and stockton creek, nearly opposite the palm rock, which constitutes 7 miles range to attend them, having at the sametime to attend to private practice, by the year, which I could not sacrifice for six months employments, besides other regular practice No one with common sense could expect it, I asserted in the commencement that it was too much for one Physician, and that I only engaged in it because no other could be obtained, however I promised to be faithful in the discharge of my duties, which I was, almost to the destruction of my health, though feeble, I was not absent from my post three weeks during the whole six months. In making the above statement, I have not descended to particulars, and shall not do so unless compelled, for I do not like news papers brickering but I have been compelled, to write thus, to prevent myself from becoming a scape goat, to bear away the sin of others.

J. M. MOORE.

Mr Editor.

Permit me space in your columns, to notice the contradiction of "Elijah Johnson:" You know that I gave it as my opinion, and that of many others, that it was not to the interest of the people of Liberia, to invite other powers to acknowledge the independence of Liberia, and that treaties, with stipulations, like those of England and France could not now be ratified by the Liberian Senate. Mr. Editor I have but a few words, to say—but they are to the point—and will, I think satisfy your readers that I did not write unadvisedly—

When the Senate of Liberia had the first treaty under consideration, did they ratify it without reluctance? I think I now see James Brown and Jacob W. Prout standing in their places in the Senate, as they did, when the Treaty was under consideration for ratification, contending, that some of the stipulations of the English treaty were entirely inadmissible—many of our good citizens held the same doctrine, among whom was the lamented Hilary Teage. Onevery occasion, when it was prudent to do so he boldly proclaimed that we had surrendered privileges, which no people could reasonably expect from us. The Treaty was however, through influences, which it may not be proper to name, ratified, and we all know the consequences. The second treaty, came up, on another occasion, for ratification—it contained features similiar to those of England—in fact, it surrenders many commercial privileges, without our receiving an equivalent in return. Do you want me to tell you how it was eventually ratified? A month before the meeting of the Legislature, it was rumored among the people that the French treaty was nearly word for word as the English. From all parts of Monrovia, the people spoke against its ratification, and the opposers were so numerous and determined in their objections that the executive became apprehensive that it would be rejected, and adopted a course, which I hope never will be done again—and that was, to send out of the Republic, for a Senator—yes!! to send an express for a Senator whose duties called him out of the State, with reasons which made it imperitive on him to be in his place in the Senate. The Gentleman was in his place when the Legislature commenced its session. When the treaty was read in the Senate, it was the signal for the people to commence a warfare against it—loud was the opposition—the senate hesitated and looked on—remonstrances poured in—the House of Representatives, unaminously passed a resolution, and drew up a remonstrance and sent it to the Senate, recommending that no steps should be taken to ratify, the treaty. For days this was the state of things at the capital of Liberia, and I hope, never to witness another under like circumstances.

But you ask, was the treaty ratified? It was, and I will tell you under what circumstances. President Roberts was not in Liberia—he was in England on a Mission from his government to that of Great Brittain, for the conciliation of matters, then presenting a very unpleasant appearance. The Hon: A. D Williams was the then Executive office—he exerted his extensive influence, got the members of his cabinet to take a live interest in the treaty—gained over the leading men in the opposition, and through the interest and influence of this combination, the treaty was silently, you may say—ratified. What kind of argument of Mr. Williams, allayed excitement? It was this—"that though there were objections to the treaty, nevertheless, it would be policy for us to make friends though we sustained some injury thereby—that President Roberts was then in England under a very unfavorable circumstances, and possibly, if the news reached France of the rejection of the treaty, the French Government might construe it as a disrespect." This is about the pith of the argument used by Mr. Williams. Mr Herald. I have here given you a history of facts—Refer to the journals of the Legislature, and to the citizens generally, and they will corroborate all I have said. And Sir. I will tell you further, that every member of President Roberts cabinet will, if it becomes necessary oppose any treaty containing stipulations like those of England and France.

It is unnecessary for me to say more—nothing can be gained by following the reasonings of "Elijah Johnson"—I have given you facts, which cannot be controverted.

Yours &c.

LOTT CARY.

Monrovia July 12th 1854.

Mr. Herald—In the last number of your paper you were pleased to take up the cudgel of "Lott cary and would inflict upon the head of your unknown friend a severe castigation, for presuming to controvert sentiments advanced by a correspondent who "is known at your office." But thanks to the weakness of the position you volunteer to defend—for it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of a Newspaper editor—the chastisement you would deal out fails in its effects.

Elijah Johnson, you say, obtruded himself into your office "through the window when there was no person present." However, with great magnanimity—that your readers should know something of the writer who comes forth and denies statement which are every day made and reiterated, and that too by men whose voice at all times can be heard in the councils of the nation"—you permitted his "effusion" to come to the light. Bravo, Mr. Herald, many thanks for your disinterested generosity.

No one doubts, I presume, that Lott Cary is known in the Herald office!—nor is his honesty questioned. It is not a strange thing, however, for honest men sometimes to be mistaken in their views; and, from false premises—though not apparent to them—to advance sentiments diametrically opposed to reason and common sense:

These are every day occurrences amongst the best of men; and, in all charity, I admit this to be the mistaken position of Lott Cary, when he asserts that "it is not the wish of the people of Liberia that other powers be asked to acknowledge the independence of Liberia;" and that no treaty containing stipulations like these subsisting between this government, England, and France can be ratified by the Senate." These opinions, emanating doubtless from honest convictions—though erroneous—are laid down distinctly, as conclusive; yet you tell us before they are condemned, he should be called upon to explain himself fully—to give the reasons which induced him to advance such opionions." This is a kind of special pleading, Mr. Herald, altogether behind the age; and though you adopt it, you are not backward to take upon yourself to explain my language to mean what seems to your judgement best suited to your case. The public, however, are not to be so deceived—What I have said was upon mature reflection, and I abate not a word; nay, I repent that "I am aware that a few, and only a few—" mark the parenthesis—"of our commercial men have raised objections to some of the treaty stipulations" "This," you say, "may be understood to mean that the views of commercial men on this subject are not of sufficient importance to merit consideration." No. no, Mr Herald, the sentence is not to be tortured into any such meaning. I am fully sensible of the importance of the opinions of commercial men, and that in all foreign commercial relations entered into by the government their interests should be consulted. But in considering the views of this class of our fellow citizens: which should predominate, the opinions of the many or the few?—I said, and still maintain that objections were raised by "only a few;" and I believe I may confine that few to some two or three merchants in the whole Republic; you will please also excuse me Mr. Herald, if I differ from you in the assertion "that a few only of the merchants bring in half of the revenue" this cannot be sustained by any amount of reasoning. The merchants of Liberia, as a class, are liberal in their commercial views, and have no wish to restrict commercial enterprise: They fear not, honorable competition: And what government desires to secure more than this to its Citizens? Not England. But, Mr. Herald, what most astonishes me is, that you should allude to the "aborigines" in connection with this subject. Surely you can never prove that the stipulations referred to unfavorably affect them, and with respect to "the vessels of Liberia being hauled up" in consequence of such commercial relations, give your self Mr. Herald, no uneasiness: at present there are no such indications, but on the contrary maritime activity is decidedly increasing in the Republic

Yours truly—this time through the key hole,

ELIJAH JOHNSON.

SPORTING EXPEDITION.

A short time since a party of three gentlemen from this place went on an expedition up the Messurado for the purpose of sport—Arriving at the destined spot 9 miles, they landed, and after solacing themselves with various creature comforts that they had provided themselves with, and making preperations for the morrow, they rolled themselves up in their Blankets and slept as only sportsmen can sleep——Before dawn they were aroused by those they had engaged to mark various species of Game.—A Dip in the Messurado, a cup of Coffee, and a segar having braced up their nerves they felt themselves equal to any encounter. They then followed their guides to a spot where a number of chimpanzies had been seen the previous day.—On arriving near the place a sudden exclamation from one of the party induced the others to stop and see what was the matter; on looking round an immense brute in the shape of an Old Man Chimpanzie was observed in a threatening attitude, they (the party) immediately place themselves in battle array and poured in a volley which staggered the Old Boy, he however soon recovered himself and made a most infuriated charge upon the person nearest to him (around paunchy little gentlemen) and with an immense branch of a tree which he seized, he felled the unfortunate sportman to the ground; he then rushed to the encounter with the others, when a well directed volley poured in brought the old fellow to the ground, on examining him, we found he measured 4 feet 11 inches and his muscular proportions were almost incredible:—we then paid attention to our unfortunate fellow sportsman, whose wounds we found to be very slight, and with the aid of a little brandy applied externally and internally, he was soon in a state to accompany us further. We then proceeded some distance without seeing anything, till one of our guides who had gone a head returned, and by signs and words gave us to understand there was game a head; we very cautiously followed him for about 1-2 a mile when by his violent gesticulations we were led to expect we were in the immediate neighbourhood of it; we, by his direction, crawled some distance upon our hands and knees and on our looking through the bushes could see at the distance of about 70 yards a herd of fine deer 7 or 8 in number of the elk species. We then agree that each should single out a particular one, and were taking deliberate aim, and on the point of firing, when the aforesaid little gentlemen was seized with a violent convulsion of the nose, and began sneezing in a most terrific manner, which immediately put to flight the whole herd;—several shot were fired, and various deer were declared to be struck, but none left on the field; the party then commenced abusing the unfortunate little paunchy, who ultimately made his peace by saying he would stand a champayne dinner:——The sun having now become intensely hot, we bethought us of the most expeditions way of returning, and our guides jogging on a head, we proceeded in a jovial humor towards our place of embarkation, when all at once in the open, up jumpt a Red Deer when all the fire arms were brought to bear upon him, and a regular volley poured in, the unfortunate brute dropt, all hands declaring they had struck him in such and such a place, but on examining it, only one ball appeared to have struck, and that on the back of the head; however we shouldered our game and proceeded onwards without any further adventure.—We then jumpt into our boat, and after strengthening the inward man with such good things as we had, commenced our homeward passage, on our way we passed a snake in the water and fire arms were again in requisition, when the unfortunate little paunchy with his usual precision of fire, commenced with a revolving rifle and each succeeding shot fell in closer and closer proximity to the boat, and had there been many more to fire doubtles would have been too near to be harmless,—at any rate the snake escaped, and we made our way home, much pleased with our days amusement, and at a future day intend to make another excursion on a more extended scale, and should it prove agreeable dear Mr. Editor, we will transmit our further explour. Yours &c. ONE OF THE PARTY.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, JULY 19th, 1854.

Our obligations. There is not a man in Liberia but has obligations to maintain—of course we allude to such as know how to do right, and how to shun evil. It is perfectly absurd in a man, because he pays his taxes, and is known as a peaceable citizen to suppose that the State has no other claims upon him. We will not, for a moment, imagine an idea so preposterous, as that, there is a Liberia so ignorant as to suppose that these are the only duties required of him. He is imperitively bound by the compact which holds us together as a community, as a people, to exert his best energies to advance the interests of his country—to be ready on all occasions to support the laws—to suppress insubordination, and to support and defend the ministers of justice in the execution of their duties. When law and order are trampled upon, there is no security for property or life. Let it once be understood that the reckless and irresponsible may act as they think proper—that they may stand up in opposition to the laws, and that there are not good men enough to punish them; a state of confusion and anarchy will inevitably predominate When once the vicious and insubordinate get things into their hands, it will not be a easy matter, to reform them to a healthy condition. The State holds every man bound to be at its call, and him who can sit calmly and view disorders without bestiring himself to put them down, is unworthy, totally unworthy to enjoy the privileges of a free citizen. No circumstances can justify him in remaining indifferent to the condition of his country—he should be always on the alert—always ready to correct abuses, and to stand forth as a shield to ward off the darts, the enemies of good order may shoot at her. So far as we are informed there is no people in the world, from whom more is expected, than from the people of Liberia. The civilized world is watching their progress with no little interest—some of the nations, from the most pure and holy motives, and others from a fear, that the African race, may, notwithstanding, their prediction, yet prove themselves capable of self-government How necessary is it then, for the honor of their race, and the weal—being of their country, that every citizen should think and feel that it is his parmount duty to serve his country with all his might—to obey its laws, and to be ready at all times to resist every disposition in the turbulent to create disorders. Let it be known far and wide that the people of Liberia, are a law-abiding people—that they honor and respect the ministers of the law and they will gain the confidence of the world. But let them bear a character adverse to this, and they will be scouted—their whole race will be a by-word of reproach to every people, and their enemies will triumph in the fulfilment of their prediction.

These remarks are not called forth from any recent occurrence; nor can we say, there ever has been an occasion when the police officers, have not been able to suppress any riot, and maintain the dignity of the laws. But in view of the great influx of emigrants, who never knew what it was to live free and under wholesome laws—ignorant of the noble principles which should influence every freeman: we have thought it prudent thus to state distinctly what we conceive to be the duty of the people of Liberia to their country. Judging from what we already know of the people, we are confident, that when circumstances demand it, they will stand forward as one man, in defence of their sacred rights.

Mintary—Johnson's Guards:—This company, we learn, will parade on Wednesday, the 26th inst, at 7 o'clock A. M. in front of the residence of Lieut Colonel McGill, for the purpose of receiving a splendid stand of colors that are being prepared for the corps by a number of Ladies of this town. The standard will be presented by a committee of the fair donors, one of whom—an accomplished and witty young lady—will address the corps on the occasion.

Be careful, young gentlemen, that, before appearing on the ground, you have your hearts dressed in coats of mail, that cupid's darts may not enter and you made Captive at the very commencement of your military career.

POETRY.

For the Liberia Herald

Liberian Ministers praying fervently, for the spread of the Gospel over their Country.

O heavens! let thy gracious word extend
Throughout our Country—filling every heart
With heavenly knowledge, that will ne'er depart,
But reach the sinners strike the sinners bend.

We pray for wisdom—teach our souls to know
That fear of Him who rules earth and sky:
Before thee, saints and angels justly lie,
And raise their voice to thee and thee adore,

Hence here we stand, and minister thy word,
We teach to all around thy precious name;
We are not of thy gospel news ashame,
But [illegible] disciples from thee heard

Hear us oh heavens! thou exalted high,
Our Father—God: thou ruler of the skies:
Who gives us daily from thy rich supplies,
And when we speak, thou hearest, and is nigh.

Open to us the fountain of thy love,
And let us taste the riches from thy store;
That we may turn to thee, and thee adore,
For all thy blessings on us from above.

We love thy name, 'tis pleasure to our ears,
Thou art to us a balm for every wound,
Thy spirit tills our souls, and is the boon
That makes us humbly bold, and cease our fears.

Let darkness from our country take its flight:
Let heathens cease to break thy holy laws,
And turn to Christ—partake in christian joys,
And thus equip them for the pilgrim's light

Then will they sing "free grace" to all around;
And stand steadfast in christian liberty,
They'll thank Thee, that they have th' ability,
To say to all—For Canaan I am bound.

Gracious Redeemer o our simple race;
Thou Son of God, and King of every saint:
Thou who dost sinners with thy word acquaint,
And cherishes by saying seek my face.

Thy face we seek—pour down thy heav'nly pow'r,
And fill us with that love that casts out fear;
That we may enter in, where not a tear
Nor pain can form that region with a show'r,

And [illegible] Lord, to all we here implore;
Grants us all our requests we humbly beg;
Then when we lay upon our cold death bed,
Take us to heaven with thee, forever more.

R. H. G.

RUSSIANS AND RUSSIANS.

The Russian Empire embraces the largest portion of the Sclavic race. (A race which numbers about eighty millions of people, of whom fifty four millions are Russians,) was founded by Rurick, Grand Duke of Novogorod, in the ninth century. Wladimir, the first Christian monarch of Russia reigned at the close of the tenth century. About the year 1200 Russia fell under the dominion of the Mongol Tartars, who held it in subjection until 1540, when the nation recovered its independence. The country on the river Dneiper, called Little Russia, was the cradle of the empire. From that region proceeded the people who gradually extending themselves in various directions, with the Finns on the North, made up the empire of Russia. For centuries their progress was checked by surrounding nations, and thus they were secluded from the sea, and consequently from navigation, the pursuits of which have so important an influence on the character of nations. Under Peter the Great the Sclavic nations of Russia were made fit for action by calling in the aid of foreigners and introducing them into various official employments. Russia then became the threatre for adventurers from all nations, particularly for French and Germans. Peter extended the bounds of the empire to the seas on the northwest and southeast, and made his subjects a maritime people.

Since the time of that Emperor, the nation has consisted of two strata—The Sclaves, a submissive and servile race, and the foreigners, who are the officials of the empire. The Imperial family is of German origin, and the Russian nobility is composed mostly of families of other nations than those of the Sclavic race. Many of the principal cities and towns were founded by people of the Germanic race. The reliable power of a nation consists in the moral individual energy of its people. Centralization, or concentrated action, is the cause of the strength which the Romanic race have displayed in their history. The power of the Sclavic race depends on the exhaustless success of their population, often controlled by foreign rulers. As to liberty in Russia, it is only a dream of some young noblemen who have visited France England and Germany. The Sclaves are a dreamy, melancholy people, with some amiable qualities; but they can not be changed into freemen. There is no hope for the Sclaves, Hindoos and Negroes except by contact with the Germanic race, possessing ideas of liberty and self-government. The Sclavic race do not possess the spirit of liberty; they are submissive to despotic rulers, they have no creative genius, and their ideas of religion are shown in their attachment to the forms and ceremonies of the Greek Church, which they view with much the same feeling as they behold a military parade. Neither the Roman law nor the common law of England have yet been introduced into the empire. Even public opinion is not permitted in Russia, nor even yet the right to applaud in places of amusement; for if this were allowed, the right to condemn would follow. The will of the Emperor is supreme. His word is law, and his edicts overrule all things. He is the head of both Church and State, and controls politics as well as religion.—Personally he is popular, and can walk about among his subjects unattended. Politically he is severe. The chief political opposition against him must come from the hereditary nobility, and they are more unpopular with the masses than he is, so his authority may be considered secure.

As to the social condition, the Serfs form the basis of society, and number about forty millions.—They live in huts constructed after the manner of our cabins, and a sheepskin form their perpetual dress, which lasts them for life. They cannot marry without the consent of the master, neither can the master compel them to marry. They are brought up in ignorance, and are as practically ignorant of the Sermon on the Mount as the wildest savages. They adore the Czar, and when they die expect to go to heaven by holding a leaf received from the priest between their fingers. It is from these that the Czar draws his soldiers. The next are freemen or citizens, who are manufacturers, sailors, post-riders, &c., and many of them attain great riches. They are beasts in their passions, and barbarians in their pleasures. The nobility are divided into two classes, hereditary and by appointment. The whole pressure of power is against [illegible] nobility, which is assailed by the Czar, who has endeavored to elevate the Serfs, not for their benefit, but to impoverish their masters.

The empire in Europe is nearly two thirds as large as our own country and in Asia nearly three times as large. It is the most extensive empire in existence at the present time, and to all evidences will be the largest will ever rise here-after. Every different soil is embraced within its area, and from Kamtschatka to the sunny South the labors of the husbandman are rewarded. It contains every variety of climate, from the frozen northern Winter to the balmy southern Summer. The empire contains the representatives of one hundred nations in its vast domain, all of Asiatic origin, and yet this extensive empire is controlled by the will of one man, and influenced by one religion—that of the Greek Church—of which the Czar is the head.

It presents, in its vastness, a rude but gigantic Hercules, which at any time would attract our attention, but especially now, when its influence is more felt in Western European affairs. It has to us a peculiar relation as regards extent of territory. Since De Tocqueville's time the power of Russia and America have been more and more recognized by the other powers of the earth, and it is evident that Russia and America are meeting already as antagonists of two great principles of government—democracy and absolutism.

The present aspect of things in Europe threatens a crusade in right earnest against Russia and Panslavism. Some think the time may come when America will be drawn into the contest. Heaven forbid, we say from our heart. If Americans are wise, come what may, they will take no active part in the wars and conflicts of Europe. Let Russia "fulfil her mission," and America hers. The material interests of the two nations need not be made to clash. God grant they never shall.—New Orleans Baptist Chronicle.

AN ENGLISHMAN IN FRANCE.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent gives the following good hit at English gravity:

It is an Englishman's privileges to grumble, and why should not Americans? They go grumbling from one end of Europe to the other, with their cockered and ill setting dresses hugging about them, their huge traveling-shawls, their enormous whiskers, and round red faces looking very much like one of their own puddings ere it is taken out of the bag. You may know an Englishman by three things. He always dresses outlandishly, he always keeps a tight grasp on his purse, thinking everything is enormously dear; and always contradicts you, when he can when he can possibly do so, with a regular Dr. Johnson-like air, as though that was the conclusion of the whole nation.

You doubtless heard of the John Bull who could never go to sleep in peace without raising his window, every time the watchman passed under it calling "twelve o'clock," and bawling out "it is not 12 o'clock, you rascal; it wants five minutes of it." He was a type of this race. Poor Mr. Crapeaud knows not what to make of him. All the wildest, most improbable stories about the eccentricities of Englishman are rites in France, and are readily swallowed by the mass of the people. Here is one that is now making a great noise in Paris, and it it said to be an actual occurrence. You can judge.

Sir Edward E is the hero of the tale, and he is said to be as wealthy as his tastes and habits are outre and extravagant. He engaged a celebrated French pianist, not long since, to entertain with his talent a large and brilliant party he was about to give at his hotel in the Rue St Honore. The evening came round, and so did the musician. On being ushered into the drawing-room, he found four or five people already arrived. On an ottoman in the farther end of the room, was seated a lady magnificently dressed, whom Sir Edward immediately introduced to the plainist as "Lady E, my wife." Not the slighest bend of the head nor any other acknowledgment on the lady' part, followed the introduction. "And this," continued the nobleman, turning to another lady, seated at the table, and attentively engaged in perusing the last novel, which lay open before her, "this is my sister, the honorable Miss E., she is a great reader, and frequently sits up very late, engaged in her favorite occupation." The poor artist bowed with a true Frenchman's grace, but his salutation was taken just as much notice of as his previous one. "This," pursued the polite Sir Edward, pointing to a gentleman seated at another table smoking his brow with his hand, and intently gazing upon the squares of a chess-board, "this is the greatest chess player in England; I am happy to be the medium of your acquaintance."

Not a nod, not the movement of a muscle, indicated that the great chess player was conscious of the presence of a stranger. To say that the poor pianist was in despair at this brutal reception, would but half express the feelings of mortification and astonishment. But, thought he to himself, there is probably some mistake connected with this manner of reception that will soon be cleared up in the meantime, perhaps, I shall have better success with the fourth party, and he looked and observed that a fourth gentleman standing by the neighboring console and engaged in scenting the odor of some magnificent camelias in vases of Sevres [illegible] said Sir E., divining his wishes, and in a measure anticipating them. You will allow me to present to you my most intimate friend, the Viscount B——. He twice saved my life in India, but his many high qualities of head and heart needed not, I assure you, this additional motive to the high esteem in which I hold him." Again the Frenchman bowed and again was his bow returned with the same incivility—that is, not returned at all. Sir Edward, therefore, fearing perhaps a too hasty denouement, led the plainist up to the piano and entreated him to favor him with an exhibition of his skill. He complied, and selected a piece of his own composition.

It happened that the piano was exactly opposite the ottoman on which sat the lady to whom he had first been introduced. His fingers were flying over the keys at a great rate, when suddenly he noticed the lady's handkerchief drop. He sprang forward with all a Frenchman's gallantry to pick it up and restore it, but his amazement may be conceived when he discovered that the beautiful lady was nothing more nor less than a wax. He turned to survey the others; they were wax—the novel reader, the chess player, and the man "aux camilias." He began to suspect that Sir Edward himself was not exactly what he represented himself to be, when that gentleman came to his relief by assuring him that the real company was yet to arrive; that these statues were only figures of some of his friends then dead; that, finally, he carried one around with him wherever he went kept several servants for no other purpose than to wait on them, and always treated them with every possible mark of respect. Such is a Frenchman's idea of an Englishman.—The Sun.

The Little Courtesies of Life.

"Ill seems, said he, if he so valiant be
That he should be so stern to stranger wight;
For seldom yet did living creature see
That courtesy and manhood ever disagree."
SPENSER.

The little things of life have far more effect upon character, reputation, friendship, and fortune, than the heartless and superficial are apt to imagine. There are few indeed, however rough by nature, who are not touched and softened by kindness and courtesy. A civil word, a friendly remark, a generous compliment, an affable bow of recognition—all have an influence—while surliness, incivility, harshness, and ill-temper, naturally enough, produce an effect exactly the reverse. The American people as a whole are perhaps not remarkable for courtesy. They are so activity engaged in the bustle of life, and the onward movements of our race, that they have little leisure to cultivate or practice those polished refinements, which are the results of education, of travel, and of enlarged intercourse with society. Nevertheless, we are not a discourteous people, and in the great cities the proprieties of manner, and the civilities of form are attended to with a commendable degree of exactness. Lady Emeline Stuart Wortley, who some time since traveled in this country, describes the citizens of the United States as "particularly courteous and obliging." But a lady of refinement and accomplishments, and traveling as well for information as for pleasure, could scarcely gather another opinion, for the commanders of our steamboats, and the conductors of our railroad cars, are proverbially polite: while in intelligent circles, every where throughout the Union, a reputable stranger would of course receive marked and kind attention. Still, we are bound to confess that we are deficient in many of the little courtesies of life—courtesies that are admirably calculated to sweeten the intercourse of society, the interchange of friendly feeling, and the general communion that takes place from day to day between neighbors and companions. The excuse with the many is, that they have not time to practise the civilities to which we refer—that they are too much engaged in more important matters. Thus a friendly visit will not be repaid, a polite note will be left unanswered, a neighborly call will be disregarded, a pleasant smile will be met with a cold look of indifference, and a cordial grasp of the hand will be responded to with reluctance, if not surprise. Abstractly mean nothing, and yet the effect upon the mind and the heart is chilling and painful. The mistake that too many of us make is, in supposing that the courtesies [illegible] we are to receive every kind of attention and return nothing. And this is an error in various walks in various phases of life, and to a greater extent than people are apt to imagine. The affairs of this world should be reciprocal. A person may be willing to confer an obligation again and again. But unless there be some manifestation of gratitude and of appreciation, unless indeed the disposition be apparent to do something in return—the party that confers favor after favor, will in the end grow weary of well doing and seek out some more grateful or more sympathizing object. We are ill more or less selfish, and that description of selfishness which exacts an acknowledgment by word or by deed, either for friendship extended or affections lavished, is perhaps, as little censurable as any of the infirmities of poor human nature—if, indeed, it may be called an infirmity. We have somewhere met with the remark that there is no such thing as unrequited love—that love, which is not requited, will soon cease to exist, inasmuch as the very nature of the passion renders mutual regard essential to its continued existence. In the general sense this theory may be correct, but there are, of course, exceptions.—If, therefore, in grave matters of the heart, matters in which our all of earthly happiness may be said to be involved, reciprocity or a kindred feeling is absolutely essential, how much more will the doctrine apply to the little courtesies of life! A friendship of many years standing, as often, as we have reason to know, been chilled by indifference, coldness, and restraint, by some petty neglect or hasty remark. Distrust is excited—a doubt, a suspicion has been engendered and the unwavering confidence that existed for years has thus been broken at once and forever.

Lord Nelson,—when forced to see men whipped on board his ship, ascended to the deck precipitately, read rapidly and in an agitated voice, the rules of the service, and then cried, "Boatswain, do your duty."—Often the man would be flogged, cried—"Pardon, Admiral, Pardon!" Lord Nelson would then look around at his officers; all keeping silence, he would say, "What! not one of you, gentlemen, not one of you has pity upon that man or upon my sufferings? untie the man;" then he added, "my brave fellow, on the day of battle, remember me!"

It was very rare that the sailor thus rescued by his admiral, did not distinguish himself at a later period. One day a man was going to be whipped. It was a marine. A beautiful young girl sprang through the crowd of soldiers; she fell on her knees before Nelson, and seized his hand. "Pardon your Honor," said she, "pardon, he will never be guilty again!" "You face," said the Admiral, "answers for his future good conduct. Untie that man; he who have such a beautiful creature as this for his friend, cannot be a bad man." This marine became a Lieutenant.

LIBERIA HERALD.

We willingly insert AFRICA'S PROCLAMATION. Though not at all probable, that it will meet the eye of all to whom it is addressed; it may, however, come to the knowledge of thousands—yea, tens of thousands of Africa's oppressed children and, as the proclamation reminds us," how effectual with God is the fervent prayer of one righteous man, what then may we not truly hope for" when a thousand voices only shall ascend, simultaneously, in prayer to God? bewailing their sins and misery—asking forgivness of Almighty God, and invoking Divine interposition in their behalf.

The day, too, is happily chosen That while thousands, and thousands, of the sons and daughters of Freedom, shall be making merry—rejoicing the heart—and giving thanks for the inestimable blessings of civil and religious Liberty;—another class, of the same Heavenly origin,—but thrust out, despised, and oppressed—may, in deep humility of soul, approach "the throne of Mercy," and make their complaints known unto God who is mighty to save, and strong to deliver.

We recommend the proclamation to the favorable attention of our brethren thoughout the world, and would most respectfully entreat them—to whose knowledge it shall come—to offer to Heaven, on the day appointed, one aspiration for poor degraded Africa

READ AND OBSERVE.

For good has been spoken concerning you.

PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, O my people, Almighty God—being justly displeased with your sins—has, in his righteous Providence, seen fit to lay his afflicting, hand upon you, and for ages past, has suffered you to be torn and scattered—wronged and oppressed—to become the victims of the cupidity of almost all nations and peoples—and, in your deep distress, to water the face of the whole earth with your blood and sweat. Yes, you have been brought low; very low, even to the dust; your afflictions are great:—How long, O Lord how long? "The heart knoweth its own bitterness; but courage, my beloved ones; God is merciful and good, and does not willingly afflict the children of men "Only when they forget his ways, and turn from God, their maker—who is jealous of his glory—to choose new gods, is his wrath kindled against them, and his Divine chastisement inflicted. If however, they will return to God with full purpose of heart, confessing their sins, He is merciful and just, to forgive and will turn away from them his wrathful indignation and receive them again to his favor —Therefore, I have thought it meet and proper, O my people, to call upon you to humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God, to rend your hearts and turn unto the Lord your God, for he is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth him of the evil. Arise, my people, and go to your father and say unto him Father, we have sinned against heaven and before thee, and are no more worthy to be called thy children—but Lord teach us of thy ways, and we will walk in thy paths." Peradventure God will turn away his righteous indignation, and will deliver you from the hands of your oppressors. You cannot be unmindful, O my people, how effectual with God is the fervent prayer of one righteous man; what then may you not hope for from the united supplications of a whole people prostrate, in heart at the throne of Mercy. Now therefore, that this, my proclamation, shall come to the knowledge of all of you, my children,—whether in Europe or America, in Asia, or the Isles of the sea, or in my own bosom,—and also that you may prepare yourselves by individual self-examination, individual confession, and individual amendment" to come before the Lord with earnest prayer, springing from a truly penitent heart, I do hereby appoint Wednesday the fourth day of July One thousand eight hundred and fifty five, to be observed, by my people, throughout the whole earth, as a day of Humiliation and Prayer—invoking the Divine blessing; that God would graciously forgive all your sins; that he would smile upon, and foster the christian efforts which are being made in your behalf; that he would dispel the clouds of ignorance, superstition, and idolitry which have so long overshadowed your father land; that he would unloose your bonds, and restore you to liberty; that he would be graciously pleased to invest you again with all the rights and privileges—both civil and religious—of free men, that he would preserve you, O my people in [illegible] that he would make this Emanuels land; and that he would spread the knowledge of the Redeemer throughout the whole earth, and fill the world with his glory. Cry mightily to the Lord, saying. "Help us, O Lord our God, for we trust in thee; it is nothing with thee to help whether with many or with them that have no power O Lord, thou art our God, let no man prevail against Thee, Amen, Amen Hearken—Ye, all my people and observe this my proclamation; and though it may not be practicable for you—all of you—to assemble in the great congregation, but let the voice of prayer, though inaudible to man, ascend the hill of the Lord; and that God, whose ears are ever open to the lamentations of his people, will hear and answer, your prayer.

Given under my hand this the 4th day of July A. D. 1854.

AFRICA.

Mr. Herald:—aware of your devotedness to the interests of my people—being yourself identified with them—I beg that you will admit, as often as you deem it necessary to the object contemplated, the accompanying proclamation to a place in your columns and perhaps christian Editors, in other lands, will favor the cause of Humanity by giving it publicity.

Yours in affliction.

AFRICA.

THE FARMER.—Some one has truly remarked that "the true farmer is always a philanthropist" Not only does he toil for the provision of his wants, but in all his efforts, aims and undertakings, he is perpetually stimulated by the benevolent desire to leave the world better and more happy than he found it. Says an elegant author: "We contemplate Agriculture as subsidiary not only to abundance, industry, comfort health, but to good morals, and ultimately to religion. We regard the farmer, stript to his employment, and cultivating his hands, as belonging to the first order of noblemen." In the language of Channing—"Real greatness has nothing to do with a man's sphere. It does not lie in the magnitude of his outward agency, but in the extent of the effect which he produces."

Every student of history is undoubtedly aware that a very great majority of the distinguished men of the Revolution—its warriors and statesmen, were from the producing classes. Washington, Jefferson, and Stark, were farmers; Franklin a printer, and so with hundreds of others that might be mention.

LIBERIA HERALD

For the Liberia Herald

THE NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr Herald—

I had the pleasure, or more truly, the displeasure of noticing in the New York Herald of May 23rd an article under the Caption—"NEBRASKA—NEBRASKA TRIUMPHANT"—It contained an account of the consummation of that act to which a great portion of the people of the United States, had been, for some months previous looking with absorbing interest and fearful apprehension,—viz—the passage of the "Nebraska bill" Notwithstanding the protestations and remonstrances of many—great and small, high and low, clergymen and laymen, the bill has passed—"At eleven O'clock" (May 22nd) says the N. Y. Herald, "amid the vociferous applause of friends, and the hisses of opponents, the bill passed by the very satisfactory vote of 109 to 100." Honor and praise to the UNION.

I had been foolish enough, Mr. Herald, to indulge the hope that Liberia was making some impressions in the Southern part of the United States unfavorable to the perpetuation of Slavery; that such was the progress of Colonization—and so great the light reflected by the advancement of the age, that Slavery was becoming more and more odious to the people, and that they were anxious by every available measure to free themselves of that dark spot on the American escutcheon—that stain on their banner so conspicuous that even the glittering "Stars" and brilliant "Stripes" cannot conceal. I had hoped also that any effort to Congress to extend the Slave territory would be vehemently opposed.—that the mere idea would be scouted at, but I had forgotten that this is emphatically, above all its predecessors—the golden age, not only on account of the extensive gold deposites found; but also from the fact that gold is, in all parts of the world, the all-prevailing and dominant principle—It had escaped my mind that the pecuniary interests of men now a days are of all other interests the most important—and that therefore so long as it was to the pecuniary interest of the South to cling to its peculiar and transmitted institution, "it would be its, duty also, in order to the security and perpetuity of that institution, to increase as much as possible its strength, which, in a territorial point of view, the "Nebraska bill" was designed to effect.

"What have the people of Liberia to do with all [illegible]" This is a political matter belonging to men involving the interests of the United States and the Americans are perfectly capable of managing their affairs without the interference of so insignificant a people as Liberians. Well, we admit that they are, but we are only, as distant spectators, expressing an opinion, and we would not be tempted to say any thing on this subject, were it not that we are allied to the unfortunate class of persons in that country upon whose already depressed and sunken condition the passage of the bill will doubtless operate unfavorably.

But a few words to our oppressed brethren in the United States. What are now your hopes ye nominally free colored men of North America? Are you still, in the face of such legislation, wrapping yourselves in the delusion that the future will bring you better things? We hope your eyes were partially opened by the passage of the "Fugitive Slave Law"—and that now by the passage of the Nebraska bill, sufficient light has dawned upon you to discover to you the hopelessness of your condition as a people in that Country. O that you could behold your infatuation and see that the hopes with which you have been consoling yourselves, are deceptive, that your "fond souls have been wrapt in gay visions of unattainable bliss," so far as the United States are concerned, and that your only safety consists in fleeing from the land of your oppression to some region—of which with truthfulness and propriety you might say—

"This is my own, my native land"

You have often censured Liberians as traitors and hurled against us your bitter invectives but after all, time, "the wisest of all things" is determining who has the better side.

You contend that if you occupy the position of men at all, you must, occupy that position among men—that you will be free in the United States—that you will be elevated among the people who have oppressed you and prove in their very midst your equality with them; that being born in that country you have claims upon it which you are not willing to abandon and, lastly that you have brethren in bonds whom it would be ungenerous and unpatriotic in you to forsake in their trouble &c &c. All this reasoning appears very plausible, but no matter how specious they may be, Liberians considered that "self preservation is nature's first law" and balancing these arguments in the scale with Liberty the latter was found to preponderate, They therefore, adopted the noble sentiment "UBI LIBERTAS, IBI PATRIA."

Accordingly assisted by a few liberal minded men, they braved the dangers, of the Atlantic—and landed on the wilds of Africa, where now, after many discouragements, is rising with bright and cheering praspects a nation of colored men—a free government a new Republic the seventh Anniversary of whose birth has just been celebrated.

How different is your condition—You chose to remain in the "house of bondage" when it was your privilege to leave, Have you effected any thing by remaining? Have you, in the least degree, alleviated the condition of your "brethren in bonds"? Is not time lost then—time which might have been improved in establishing, for yourselves a nationality? The position you now occupy in that country, after all your efforts to elevate yourselves is far from being enviable, I notice frequently accounts of anti slavery meetings held by you at which boastful speeches are made and several hard resolutions passed in reference to your oppressors. But what advantage do you derive from these things? What do they all profit you?—So far as I can see you derive no advantage—they profit you nothing.

There is no other people in the world situated as you are,—and your condition is without a parallel in the annals of history To employ the language of Mr. Garrison, your professed friend and strenuous advocate, "Millions" of you, "are marketable commodities—chattels personal—Half a million who are not exposed to the horrors of the Slave plantation, are treated as a leprous race in all parts of the country." "Awful fact—a whole race in degradation!

But it is reasonable to suppose that now, more, than ever sensible of your condition—and the hopelessness of the same, you are, with eagerness of soul, looking out for some asylum from the galling oppression—Some place, distant or contiguous, where, free from the depressing effect, and blighting influence of such abject circumstances, you might be elevated as a people—We sympathise with you—and cordially tender Libera's oft reiterated invitation "COME HOME AND BE FREE"—Africa bids you come—come and enjoy the blessings which nature is ready to lavish upon you.

Providence seems to be pointing to Africa and all the events that transpire in the United States—apparently against you, viewed with [illegible] wisdom and goodness of the Creator, appear to be working together for the good of long neglected Africa and her down trodden children—But while this is our belief still we cannot cease to offer the prayer which though, it might have been more appropriate in the mouths of the children of Isreal is nevertheless somewhat suited to us. "Lord soften Pharaoh's heart, that he may let the oppressed go free"?

B——

Yours &c

Monrovia July 27th 1854.

Mr. Herald, Allow me a space in your columns to notice the candid statement given in you last number by Dr. J. M. Moore,—in reference to the Receptacle at Virginia, and the Emigrants recently located on the St Pauls

The writer proceeds—giving a discription of the building—its location and condition—the filth and crowded condition of the rooms—the open floors and a combination of various gases and odors which he says are in and about the house, and so great and powerful are these noxious aeriform products he states that they even extinguish burning tapers.

The description is truly appalling, and sufficient to arouse the sympathies even of the most hard hearted I exceedingly regret that this learned Physician should suffer himself to be led off into so great extremes as to make these representations to free himself from blame. He seems regardless of the injury Liberia may sustain from these extravagantly colored statements. Had the writer confined himself to facts in his statements—I would have been silent,—and not obtruded myself upon your patience, I will not however weary your readers with a long detail of facts to prove that many of the assertions are erroneous. I will briefly notice a few

He says, "During my attention to the Emigrants. I strove to get a committee to examine the Receptacle, but failed to succeed." This statement thus far is correct, but he has been careful not to state why he failed. The gentlemen upon whom he called (all done without my knowledge) to act as a committee &c are honest christian men and men of sound discretion—they doubtless soon perceived that there was something wrong going on—from the fact that there had been no unusual complaint against this building, and if there existed any, sufficient to condemn it, why was it that the selection of a committee had been so long delayed—until June—when the time of the emigrants had so nearly expired! or why did he fail to consult the agent or inform him of his intention! Did he breathe or intimate anything of this to Dr. Roberts the only other Physician then in the county.

The object of the writer is apparent to all—Fearing lest, as a natural consequence, censure would be attached to him—he thus attempts to exonerate himself. For it was his duty as a Physician to do all in his power, essential to the promotion of the health of his patients—which duty of course would involve the removal, as much as possible of everything in and about the house that would produce the injurious influences which he has referred to, in those, to me, incomprehensible chemical expressions. And here it may be proper to State for the information of our readers. That the Doctor has had at the Receptacle under his special control 14 different female attendents during the last 6 months—whose duties were to wait upon and attend the sick to wash and cook for them and to keep their rooms clean and in order—The amt paid for this expense alone at the Receptacle is one hundred and seventy one Dollars.

Whether he obtained a committee or not, conscious that these deleterious influencees were operating upon his patients It was his duty as a humane being, not to say a christian—to exert himself for their removal But he kept quiet—and perhaps would never have said anything had it not been extorted from him. And apart from all this, having been compelled to write, he would have succeeded pretty well had he confined himself to truth in every particular.

He says again, "As for proper medical aid the last Emigrants did not get" This is also a true statement—but one for which no thanks is due to the writer, since so great is the outcry up the river that it was impossible to conceal it—Anxious, however to clear his skirts from the censure, he attempts to make the impression that when he was employed to attend those emigrants it was understood he would still continue his private practice in this city. Such was not the case, which can be easily proved. for at the time of his employment the early part of last year to attend emigrants he started this difficulty; measures were adopted therefore when he was again employed to obviate it, so that he might give his exclusive attention to the emigrants. The arrangments at the time were so satisfactory that, as he says himself in his communication—"he promised to be faithful in the discharge of his duties"—the duties of course, which he was employed by me, in behalf of the Society, to perform. But was he faithful? Let the settlement of Virginia answer—Let the people of Caldwell reply—Yes and let the people of Kentuckey speak The unanimous answer will be HE WAS NOT. He did not then fulfil his promise to be faithful &c &c.

The Dr. says further. "In making these statements I have not descended to particulars"—What particulars does he refer to? Does he mean the "particular" cases of most outrageous neglect on his part? Does he allude to the "particular" cases of indifference which he manifested to the sufferings—an indifference at which humanity in its most baberous condition would blush! or does he mean the particular, but highly improper manner, in which medicines were administered to the sick at the Receptacle?

If he mean these "particulars," then it was well he did not "descend" to them But if he alludes to other particulars necessary, to be known, we should like to have them. We should like to know all the evils and if possible all their causes, so that in attempting a cure we may know exactly what kind of remedy to apply, and where to apply it. It is for this reason we are dissatisfied with the article of A. F Russell. We want to know, as Physicians investigation to sick persons not only that the person is diseased—but where the desease lies—and something of its character.

I am exceeding sorry that there should be necessity for these strictures, because the effect on the minds of foreign readers will be anything but favorable to our country. For myself however, I believe that a supply of good and faithful Physicians would be an efficient remedy for all these evils, and a termination for ever of the sufferings of emigrants These difficulties for the most part, grow out of a want of sufficient good medical aid.

As to the Receptacle—it is, as can be very satisfactorily proved, in a better condition than it has been for some years previous its thorough reparation about eight months ago. Medical men of ability, have practiced successfully in it—but more, as the days when it was in its worst condition, made the wonderful chemical discoveries which the late Physician, urged on by the "humanity" of Mr. Russell, has made. Perhaps they were not so scientifically learned—but we rather incline to the opinion, that the strict attention they paid to their patients left them no time for Chemical analyses and speculations.

I make no claim to chemical knowledge and am therefore unprepared to investigate critically the scientific phrases employed by the Doctor.

But as a proof that the building is not so bad to emigrants as represented, allow me Mr. Herald to state the following facts! and before I do so I beg to remind your readers that of late the mortality on the St. Pauls among emigrants has been extraordinary

Of the emigrants per Banshee which arrived here the latter part of December last 93 were located for their acclimation in this city. 165 were located on the St. Pauls in the settlements of Virginia and Kentuckey—Half of this number occupied the Receptacle—the other half were located in rented houses the most suitable that could be obtained in the settlements just named During the six months there were 18 deaths in the Receptacle, and in the same time 24 in rented houses. Let men of sense draw the inference.

But it appears that the writer was either ignorant of the dimentions and number of rooms in the Receptacle—or was unpardonable careless in his statements. He says "the Receptacle is one story and agarret containing 14 rooms below 8 by 10" This is far from a "Candid Statement." The building contains only 18 rooms below most of which are 10 by 11. The two smallest which are used as store rooms one is 9 by 11 and the other 7 by 11.

He says again, "There is no ventilation to his knowledge." Well, his "knowledge," particularly as concerns the building is no criterion, for it seems very limited or imperfect. For his information however as well as that of your readers I will state there are six Ventilation holes through the wall below the floor of suitable sizes, freely admitting air from without under the floor, and allowing whatever of foul air that exists there to escape—The floor is not open as he states—Each of the 4 rooms on the upper floor is 24 by 12. The passage is 7 feet wide and not 6 feet as he states.

I might Mr. Herald, had I the time notice several other assertions in the Dr's article—but I think I have said sufficient for the present. I will however by way of conclusion, notice his concusory climax—He says, "I have been compelled to write this to prevent myself from becoming a Scape goat to bear away the sin of others."

He may understand more of the Jewish rites and ceremonies and more about Scape goats &c than I do, but according to my impression the Doctor could not very properly become a scape goat for it was required I think that such animals be immaculate—free from blemishes.

H W DENNIS.

Monro via July 21st 1854

P. S. Mr Herald.—It is due to the public—to the colonization Society—and to myself, that Dr. H. J. Roberts, the Society's Physician in this county, should give a public Statement of facts—so far as his knowledge goes—in reference to the location and condition of the Receptacle at the Virginia settlement; of the houses generally rented along the banks of the St. Pauls, for the accommodation of Emigrants—of the general arrangements and understanding between the Society's Agent and Physicians in regard to suitable houses, nurses, and all necessary attendance upon Emigrants during the six months they are provided for by the Colonization Society; and whether he considers that Dr Moore fulfilled his engagements with me in his attendance upon the late company of emigrants.

Dr. Roberts has had several years experience and practice in attending emigrants located in the Receptacle referred to, and at other places on the banks of the St. Paul; he was also present in December last, when I engaged the services of Dr. Moore, as Physician to the emigrants just arrived and to be located in the settlements up the river, and can speak of these matters from a personal knowledge; I therefore call on him to give to the public a candid statement of the facts in the case.

I also call upon Mr. John. W. Hazell—a resident on the St. Paul—who has been employed for the last six months at the Receptacle to superintend & provide for the comfort & welfare of emigrants and to issue rations &c—To give a true statement respecting Dr. Moore's attendance and treatment to the emigrants—of the manner in which medicines have generally been administered to the sick at the Receptacle—the quality and kind of stores furnished emigrants whether every thing necessary for the sick were not kept on hand and furnished to the order of the Physician, and also to state whether there are any Ventilations to the Receptacle—and if it be a fact that the foul air in the house has been so bad as to extinguish burning lights, at any time, to his knowledge during his employment.

LIBERIA HERALD

Mr Editor.—I find in the last number of your paper two or three communications which I have perused with some interest; I allude particularly to the articles respecting the accomodation and treatment of new emmigrants and the attempts at explanation of the causes of the unusual amount of mortality amongst the last company settled along the banks of the St Paul's river.

I am, what the good people here call, "a new comer," and perhaps should not meddle with these matters. But, though recently arrived among you; let me tell you, Mr. Editor, I am a true Liberian—identified heart and hand with all her interests and may therefore, be excused for obtruding myself upon you thus early. The article in your issue of the 5th inst, and that also of the 19th signed A. F. Russell deserve only a passing notice—as for the life of me I can understand neither head nor tale of them, or what the writer is driving after. One result, however, has been attained: Mr Russell has succeeded in causing the Society's agent, and the attending Physician to draw aside, a little, the curtain, and give us a peep into these matters. Without doubt a culpable neglect rests somewhere in regard to the attention these immigrants ought to have had. Where is it, Mr Editor? Who is to blame? Mr Russell, if I understand any thing what he is talking about, says no one! Mr Dennis, pretty clearly, excuses himself: and Dr J. M. Moore—though he admits, "as for proper medical aid the emegrants did not get it"—endeavors to exculpate himself, not wishing to become a scape goat to bear away the sin of others, by enumerating many "jaw breaking" words (all gas,) defining the causes of disease: and strange still that he could not sacrifice his "private practice, by the year, for six months engagements!! Why then did Dr. Moore accept the important responsibility, and upon se, as he himself says, "to be faithful in the discharge of his duties"? The question is, did Dr. Moore fulfill his promise? Mr Dennis thinks not. He says the Physician employed on the St Paul neglected to render proper attention to his patients, and that he had some very unpleasant words with him about his unfaithfulness. In addition to this, I know that some two or three months back, public rumor was loud in her complaints against Dr Moore, in connection with his attention to this company of emegrants. With how much justice I will not pretend to say. Dr Moore however unless he would be the scape goat should explain fully why these immigrants, under his charge suffered more than previous immigrants, settled along the banks of the St Paul. This is due to the public—to humanity and, if he stand blameless, to his own reputation. In his published statement, Dr Moore speaks of the receptacle at the settlement of Virginia—its location size of the rooms, without ventilation, as he represents them—the number of persons in each room—the filthy condition of the inmates &c &c. Upon these points, Mr Editor I have taken some pains to inform myself as to the facts, and the result is, I find that the Doctor's painting is altogether too high. ly colored. to say the least of it. The location cannot be said to be "the first to accumulate an overflow of water in the time of rain. The grounds immediately around the building are level truly, though at an elevation of some ten feet above the level of the river. On the south west side of the premises "is a high eminence;" at the base of which, however, some two hundred or more yards from the house, is a creek into which the water from the eminence is received and carried off into the river; on the north east side, is another creek emptying into the river. So it is clear, that instead of the receptacle grounds receiving any surplus water from the eminence referred to, the creeks on either side aid much in draining the location on which the receptacle stands. As for ventilation, it is notorious that several openings in the mason work of the basement are left for that purpose, and each room in the building, certainly, has one door and one or more windows. I am also, Mr Editor, credibly informed that the immigrants, who occupied the house, were not the filthy creatures they are represented to be, and it appears further that the deaths at the receptacle were fewer in number in proportion to the occupants than at other houses, on more favorable locations. How is this accounted for?

Now, Mr Editor, I do not mean to say that immigrants here are as comfortably located, and in some other respects, as suitably provided for as they ought to be—far from it. I have been disappointed in this respect, and, in consequence, have had my share of suffering; but have survived—and so I believe, might one half of those neglected people up the river had they been properly attended to. Abroad, you know, Mr Editor, the climate is charged with every death that occurs among new emegrants in Liberia; and the enemies of colonization and Liberia herald it far and wide. But it is not so, Mr Editor, the responsibility rests elsewhere; and I insist that human life should not be so trifled with; the present case therefore, is one that demands explanation.

If Dr Moore's skirts are clear of the blood of these people he should show it clearly and distinctly;—that the sin be not upon his shoulders.

Yours &c &c. CANDOR.

Monrovia July 28th 1854.

Mr Herald. I must beg your indulgence once more to add a few words in reply to your correspondent, Lott Cary; who in your last issue—notwithstanding your previous admonition that he "should explain himself fully—and give the reasons" which induced him to advance the doctrine he advocates with respect to our foreign relations—only reiterates the bare assertion of his own opinion, and what he assumes to be "that of many others" viz, that it is not to the interest of the people of Liberia to invite other powers to acknowledge the independence of Liberia; and that treaties with stipulations like those of England and France could not now be ratified by the Liberian Senate."

Having reached, Mr Herald, that part of Lott Cary's communication where he tells you what he had to say was to the point, and that it would satisfy your readers he did not write unadvisedly"—I say, when I had read thus far my anticipations were on tip toe; now we shall have it, thought I, right and left—possibly, reasons full, clear and conclusive. But expectation was scarcely inspired when lo! as quick as thought, your author flew off at a tangent:—abandoning altogether so much of his opinion as relates to the wish of the people, that no other powers be invited to acknowledge the independence of Liberia. This much then, I presume may be considered settled and at rest Lott Cary however must need break a lance; he therefore returns, full tilt, to the charge, upon the question of the ratification of the English treaty before the Senate—and, with great complacency puts the question. "Did they ratify it without reluctance?" He also cites two distinguished Senators, whom he represents as, "standing in their places in the Senate, contending that some of the stipulations were entirely inadmissible," and that the same doctrine was held by the lamented Hilary Teage. All this Mr Herald, may be true to me, however, it is a subject of much doubt; as I shall proceed to show. Now it is a remarkable fact, within the recollection of all, who attended the senate during the deliberations referred to, except Lott Cary who, strangely enough, in the heat of his fancy has forgotten it—that Senator Prout, standing in his place in the Senate, moved the resolution—seconded by Senator Brown—ratifying the English treaty. But Lott Cary gravely tells us, the treaty was ratified "through influences which it may not be proper to name." What, Mr. Herald, were these honorable senators bribed? In the name of the patriotic dead, I answer fearlessly, no; they would scorn the man, who would attempt such baseness with them.

And Mr Herald what further light is reflected by the second clause of the writer's text?—Why that "the second or French treaty came up for ratification, and it contained features similar to those of England," and what is the result, according to Lott Cary's showing; why a month before the meeting of the Legislature, from all parts of Monrovia the people spoke against it, and when the treaty was laid in the Senate, it was the signal for warfare—the Senate hesitated and looked on—the house of Representatives unanimously remonstrated—and the Executive became apprehensive that it would be rejected." Wonderful. But lo! this treaty, too, was ratified by the Senate and Lott Cary engaged "to tell you, Mr Herald, how it was eventually ratified" How pray? The Vice President adopted a course which he hopes will never be done again: to send out of the Republic for a Senator:—he the Vice President, exerted his extensive influence—got the members of his cabinet to take a lively interest in the treaty gained over (?) the leading men in the opposition—and through the interest and influence of this combination (!!) the treaty was silently you may say ratified. A desperate case to be sure, requires a desperate remedy. Lott Cary, however, to my notion, has not applied the proper nostrum to his sick patient But how far he has succeeded in convincing your readers that the course adopted by the executive was, or was not judicious I leave for them to determine. I may add one word, however, with respect to the opposition "from all parts of Monrovia"—the remonstrance of the House of Representatives &c &c. Which is just this—as Lott Cary will doubtless remember and admit—the assembling of the Legislature by the Executive, ostensibly for the purpose of ratifying the French treaty, was considered, by many of the citizens of Monrovia, premature and wholly unnecessary; hence the array of opposition—without reference to ratification. In controverting the opinions of Lott Cary. I set out with the view Mr Herald, of obtaining information respecting the baneful tendencies of our treaty stipulations, with regard to commerce. Upon this subject however, your author maintains strict silence; except to reiterate his opinion, without stating a single ground of objection. Now, Mr. Herald I have not pretended to deny that objections were raised to some of the stipulations of these treaties: and was this a thing not to be expected? strange indeed would it be if every man in a community approved every provision of a treaty, or any other law:—but I do deny that the objections referred to were as formidable as Lott Cary represents them to have been. I am aware that the lamented Hilary Teage did express regrets at the necessity of some of the stipulations of the English treaty: but he readily admitted that liberal commercial views and other considerations not to be disregarded, over balanced his objections. In proof of this, allow me to inquire, Mr Herald, who was the commissioner on the part of this Government to negotiate the French treaty?—you answer the lamented Hilary Teage—so he was. It is reasonable to suppose that he—holding the doctrine, according to Lott Cary, that we, by the the English treaty, had "surrendered privileges which no people could reasonably expect from us," would have consented to a treaty with the French—as Lott Cary has it—"nearly word for word as the English"?—I trow not. Thus Mr Herald, I have given you the history of facts—that are facts "which cannot be controverted," and leave them with you and your readers to judge of their merits.

Lott Cary says further—important information indeed—"that every member of President Robert's cabinet will, if it becomes necessary (!!) oppose any treaty containing stipulations like those of England and France"

If it becomes necessary I presume they will. But I am treading upon high ground: and as Lott Cary, possibly, is in a position to be well informed upon matters of cabinet deliberations, I knock under upon this point, and so make my bow—thanking you, Mr Herald, for the kind indulgence you have extended to

Your unknown

ELIJAH JOHNSON.

Monrovia July 25th 1854

Mr Herald.

If you will grant me a corner in your paper, I will respectfully entreat the author of the article, in your last number, professing "to give a candid statement in reference to the emigrants at the receptacle during the last six months ending June 20th, to explain the following paragraph occuring therein for the enlightening both of myself and others of your readers, who have not enjoyed the benefit of initiation into the mysteries of medical technicalities. It is as follows: "Atmospheric impurity is an abundant source of disease. carbonic acid, carbonic oxide, the different forms of, carburetted hydrogen, hydro-sulphuric acid, and sulphurous acid, are almost all that proceed from natural sources, or ordinary artificial process in quantities likely to prove injurious to health, others such as, chlorine muriatic acid gas nitric oxid or nitrous acid vapour. &c &c. The learned writer no doubt fancied himself preparing a medical lecture to be delivered before students scientifically informed. Is it possible that a candid statement with reference to the emigrants, could not be given without the introduction of such tremendously long words. Poor me! I began with eagerness to read the communication, entertaining large hopes as to the candid information I should receive from the writer who I thought having been the attendant Physician of the emigrants up the river would possess a large amount in stock.—But lo! when I got half through and encountered such hardwords as 'carburetted hydrogen, hydro-sulphuric &c" I was fairly bewildered I could not for the life of me see what those words had to do with the "candid statement in reference to the emigrants.' but I attributed the want of sight to my naturally dull vision, and stood perfectly still wondering to my poor ignorant self how the learned could retain in their memories such mighty big words? and concluded that it was a great privilege for one to be scientific in his attainments. Mr Herald, will you, or the author of the article, cause some ray of light to dawn upon my pathway with respect to this matter? Excuse my presumption and correct my errors, for I am

ONE SEEKING LIGHT.

Monrovia July 20th 1854.

A CARD.

Mr Editor:—I am directed by the Professors of the "Medical and Scientific Institute" of—no matter where—to request, through the medium of your columns, that the Rev. Dr. J M. Moore, D D; M. D; D. C. L; &c &c—Bah! nothing like dubbing a man with all his titles—will give, for the information of the Faculty and the public in general, a solution of the technicalities employed by him in his learned statement, published in your paper of the 19th inst. It is also desirable that the learned chemist will enlighten the public by stating the most approved mode of testing the deliterious effects of the numerous gases he mentions, "upon the human economy."

Yours most graciously.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, AUGUST 2nd, 1854.

Vessel Stranded—The American brig Harp, Capt. Camden of, and from Baltimore with a full cargo of Merchandise and some twenty or thirty emigrants arrived in our harbor on the afternoon of the 31st ultimo. During the night the wind blew strong from the westward, when about mid-night the vessel commenced draging her anchor, and about 2 O'clock in the morning took the beach a little to the north of the enterance of the river. The surf was very high where she struck—She soon bilged—and, of course, is a total loss. By great exertion the passengers and crew were landed in safety. A large force is now employed in landing what can be secured from the wreck: very little however can be saved.

We deeply sympathise with the poor emigrants most of whom barely escaped with their lives several of these emigrants, we are told, had with them the means of making themselves quite comfortable in their new homes,—but much or little the loss falls heavily on them all. We commend, with great pleasure, the kindness we observed towards these people by many of the Citizens of this place—especially the female portion, whose benevolent hearts ever prompt them to acts of charity. Early on the morning of the unfortunate wreck, many of these might be seen passing with well filled baskets pots of coffee—and bundles of dry clothing to administer to the comforts of the distressed. This is worthy of all praise.

We welcome the return of our fellow citizen, Mr A. F. Johns, who came passenger in the unfortunate Harp. Mr Johns had been on a visit to the United States for commercial purposes, and owned a large portion of the Harp's Cargo:—we understood his property is covered by insurance. Several others of our citizens, who had considerable freight on board this vessel, are not so fortunate. Our young and enterprising townsman, Mr. Sims, who returned from the U. S. on the 26th ultimo, in the ship "Sophia Walker," forwarded the most of his goods by the Harp—and has no insurance.

LIBERIA SENTINEL.

We have the pleasure of welcoming the "Liberia Sentinel"—It comes out under the superintendence of our esteemed friend, the Honorable Edwd J. Roye, we give him a hearty welcome, and hope that he will assist us in advocating the claims and interest of Liberia. Our space will not permit us to make further remark but we hope in our next, to do so.

Anniversary of Liberia's Independence.

On the 26th ultimo, the seventh anniversary of Liberia's Independence was celebrated. The oration &c, was delivered in the M. E. Church. The orator was Rev. A. F. Russel. We will not attempt to give a description of the oration. It is sufficient to say—that every Liberian praised it, and the orator is the lion of the day. "Johnson's Guard's turned out handsomely, and gave a splendid dinner at which was his excellency the President and his cabinet—the British Consul, and other foreign gentlemen. On the evening a splendid supper was given, at which the aforenamed gentlemen were also present. We will also record that a "Dance" took place on the occasion. Our good pious folks did not approve of it. It can't be helped. Let things, if done in decency, have their course. Our space will not permit us to make further remark. We may do so on another occasion. But we must congratulate the city Council on the admirable manner which they conducted affairs on that day. The Ladies they gave was a splendid one.

To Correspondents:—A. F. Russell, in reply to H. W. Dennis;—"Lott Cary" and "Brand Snatcher" in our next.

We have devoted much of our present number to the contributions of our friends, our readers will therefore excuse the paucity of editorial. We will make amends in our next

AN AWKWARD MISTAKE.

A Frenchman—these Frenchmen are surely the very bodies corporate of the inventive faculty—lately left Paris for London, big with an idea that he had at length discovered the means of rendering a vast service to mankind, by triumphing over the element of fire. He stated through the public prints that he had, after much study and great labor, fabricated a species of armor, encased in which he could walk uninjured through the fiercest fires; and as the metropolis of England, during the winter months, was the peculiar threatre of conflagration, he had most philanthropically come over for the purpose of offering himself as a kind of human salamander, to assist in the recovery of valuable property in peril amids' the flames, or to enroll himself a super-extra or amateur fireman, on any of the great establishments in the city.

The boldness with which he announced his arrival, and the nerve he exhubited in the interviews which he had with the various agents of the innumerable London Insurance offices, at length drew on him the notice of the Government; and as nothing is there adopted without standing the test of experiment, an offer was mad him that a fire should be prepared at the expense of the public, where before duly authorized officers, the validity of his pretensions might be proved. Monsieur most joyfully complied with the terms, and a time and place for the trial were assigned. In the outskirts of London, a short distance from Hammersmith, a ruinous extent of buildings, formerly used as cowpens, &c, by an extensive cow keeper, who had failed, was filled with, a variety of combustibles, affording, however, clear avennes of ingress and egress, thereby from greater ventilation causing a fiercer glow of heat. Here, on a certain day, the Frenchman, with a few of his personal friends, and a deputation from the government, were assembled. The word was given, and a light being applied, in a few moments a scene of conflagration, to which that where the holy men of antiquity, Shadrach, Meshech and Abednego so conspicuously figured, could hardly be compared, burst forth in awful grandeur upon the astonished neighborhood. Nothing daunted, the Frenchman, assisted by his friends, quickly arrayed himself in his armor, which then appeared to be a kind of helmet, cuirass, and greaves, manufactured of the fossil asbestos, or amianthus, which is well known to the cnemist to be indestructible by fire. He had also by means of pipes fabricated of the same material, managed to obtain from an air pumping machine, worked by his friends, a sufficient quantity of pure air to be able to respire freely in the portable house he had thus constructed. All being ready, away darted the Frenchman, and entered the burning building by the avenue which seemed to all the most intensely flaming. For a moment, just one moment, he was invisible when in the midst o the the most awful anxiety, the most painful solicitude of the spectators, the rafters of the building crackling, and sending aloft myriads of sparks, the flames roaring through the hollow passages, and darting and issuing forth a thousand tongues of devouring fire, he suddenly emerged from the spot where he was seen to enter, an struggling forward with evident difficulty, he fell on the ground in front of his friend, who had hastened forward to assist him. It was sometime before his unwieldly apparatus was removed, when he was found insensible; a few moments of judicious attention, and a little cold water revived him. When he had come a little to himself, he pressed his hand to his head, looked around, and as consciousness gradually entered his brain, he threw himself in an attitude of intense excitement, and looking towards the judges of the feasibility of the scheme, exclaimed in tones of pitiable appealing, "Enfin, je respire, gentlemen, I had forgotten one little circumstance; I had provided most effectually against the chance of being burned, but alas! I forgot there was no means provided against that of being BAKED." The experiment was a failure.

For the Liberia Herald

AN APPEAL TO THE COL: SOC: &c.

Mr. Herald.

When the graves of the dead, and the groans of the dying, (still continuing,) led me at first, to pick up my pen In what to some few "little hearts," that would be in the big people," turned into adamant by cruelty. My object was simple truth.—to save precious life To mittigate human suffering; By pointing out what observation had lead me to believe was the causes of it. Without interfearing with any mans pay, duty, or privilege: or without descending to particulars. I repeat that I live in the midst of these scenes. I administer to many from my table, stand by the bead side., pray with these sick, and often speak the funeral words. I said Doctors and agents reside chiefly 12 & 15 miles from these scenes and have not much chance to know of what I speak Neither did I think their was a man, with the soul of a man, with one spark of true humanity in him in the Republic of Liberia, knowing that emigrants do suffer, and suffer extreemly from the causes I was about to mention, that would have used his pen in any way than to help to bring about what I believe are the design and object of the A. M. Col. Soc If that soc, knew the real wants of people that they truly desire to live, after they are sent out to this only true home of our oppressed race in the United States I do not, and will not believe that that, society sends men, women and children out to this country to suffer, and die like sheep; when we all do believe it can be prevented to a great extent almost all of it. And I truly believe it can be to a very large extent. But if I must descend to particulars, without fear, or favor, of great, or small, I take old Divid Crocketts motto for my advice.

"One thing I leave to others when I am dead;
Be shure you are right, then go a head"

Wisdom would say, hear a man first, and then criticise his opinions. I said, I believe that I charged no man on this side of the water, Suffer me from reveling truth to take a little of this assertion back, if certain proof will make it necessary. I will charge no one, if truth will not. I now wish to state a few of the reasons, why emigrants coming to this Republic should go right where they wish, and intend to locate; or make a final settlement and acclimate in that place. I know their will be theories proposed, differing from this, but all will only go to throw light on the general truth, and I sincerely hope, tend to so throw that light on the general truth, as to meet the general, and absolutely needed wants, of the poor, and needy, and misplaced emigrant. Emigration to this Republic is increasing and will increase; let it still increase a hundred fold but prepare for that increase; take the most effectual steps to secure the end of emigration; where can be any impropriety in this? I do not so particularly espouse the cause of the "Angels visit" emigrant, who having chanced to have "the hand," the fortune, "or good luck" that maketh rich and provides against want and gives introduction;—and to whom "six months" aid from the Col. Soc. is a "small matter" any way; such may stop with the eclat of the capital; (little knowing how that eclat worked up) may take merchantile lessons and enter the traffic; Prepare for the Bar. Dedicate themselves to public office, or enter into one of the many open doors of some Mission field, or whatever else may suit the dignity of worth Such may rent the "better house."—Walk upon what they may suppose the "higher brim of the wheel."—stand out among "the swell heads"—and swim among the "big fish." Neither do I blame them, for "birds of a feather will flock togeter," if after fair trial they are of the true species, a working active set I have called these men of means "Angel visit," exceptions in this respect to the common rule, that is the no money, no A. B. C men, that come directly from the plantation &c &c. and chiefly settle on this River, to go into the soil and reveal its resources. And I vouch for it, they are useful set of men to the country, as any other Their are many men now well to do, that did not bring five dollars in cash to the country;—nor twenty in any thing else. These men of means, have the pen and the purse to defend themselves, and I wish more of them; a hundred fold, would come and dwell amongst us. It is for the latter, the "mass," of every emigration, I would speak. Nearly every emigrant coming to this Republic, comes to settle some where. Most of them to settle in some particular place had in the minds eye before ever they stated from their native to their adopted country. To that particular place they aim. The journey is not ended, nor is the excitement over, or the mind eased of its burthen until they reach that place, of hoped for destination. And delayed, and stoped short, this burden often under the circumstances kills. most of our emigrants who have nothing to depend upon, but personal vigor, industry and health with a fair chance in time to do. Beside, a scanty out fit, in clothing, cooking and farming utensils. I think only two barrels bulk, is allowed on emigrant on the ship, that waft's to this "Goodly land." Now where can be the wisdom let me ask, in stopping at Monrovia, emigrants for Virginia, or Clayashland? at Virginia, those for Clayashland? as is ever practiced too much Why cause them to rusticate, six months, in that "for famed" which the late Judge Benedict, call it "Golgotha," "Assylum" in Virginia? a house that properly fixed, and improved, might do well enough; especially, if not over crowded with lumber and life; to unlade at the expence of both. Why stop them any where, except at the place they emigrate to settle in? Why, 20 15, 10, or 5 miles, from the distined spot? Especially when the same means, will settle them right at once, and at first? How many for Clayashland lay discontented in that "Assylam" in Virginia? to burn, with fears, anxiety and discontent six months, Why stop any man, any where, against their wills of wishes? By over persuasion, wrong advice, or pretended better medical aid? Now I can testify, this one supposed duty, or authority, or advice, persuasion, wrong policy of agents or some one else; has a grave yard attached to it Be these perpetuated by whom it may; they are closely allied to death or suffering, their need be no grave; nor grave yard; no curse on the country; and a yielding climate shown a half a chance by doing right; and giving in that doing, sufficient Medical aid in the proper place &c &c. When emigrant come from America to settle in any particular place. They aim to draw their lands, in that place. Duty, family obligations, and reason, tell them bestir themselves "now," whilst house rent is paid, and some kind of shelter afforded, with medical aid to some extent. During the "six months help," which "six months" slip by soon the late emigrants take the fever very late, two, three, and four months, in many instances, spent rusticating in one settlement and their lands in another, "because they must." &c.

Then the end of six, and beginning of seven months find them prostrated "off of the society," no money, no house, no crop planted; land from 5, to 20 miles off, no Poor house in Liberia. Months spent in idle anxiety; waiting the fever; that had been spent in planting, and building, and preperation during "six months help," giving for this express purpose, loosing the whole benefit of what might first, or last save life. And many have prove', and are proving that cabbins can be built and good crops planted in the six months, to meet them, when aid tendered is withdrawn How many availing themselves of this six months, and travel, from Monrovia, 14 miles up this River weekly—through rain, and sun, work in mud, and slop—, while they can, laying by for chills, or working them off, taking shelter where they can out of rain wrather than suffer after? And suppose their families were on the ground? would not much of this killing exposure, be avoided? How many men have been passing my door, almost daily, in the last seven months, footing it five miles from this "Assylum" and back ten miles a day, through rain sun, and mud and slop with fever. Which ten miles, heard walking, could have been spent in profitable labour, and rest had they been on the ground. And why? their lands were in Clayashland; they come, to settle their, and must work while the Col Soc. helps them. And are any of them dead? Well die first as last, if travel and exposure killed them, getting to and from work Want and sickness, had as is doing killed after they had eat all, lived out all, and rent, and is put out in one day, bereft of all, to "Roote Pig or die" sick. Then it is "fally to write" may God teach my hands to war, and my fingers to fight (more yet)

A. F. RUSSELL.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald: Please allow me to occupy a short space in your columns, to give vent to a few thoughts on a subject, of which I was informed by a friend, relative to a circumstance, that took place here not long since.

A few evenings ago, some persons met in the Court House yard, our informant says, for the purpose of holding a meeting in the court house, of a military character; the door being locked, and the key in the hands of the Jailor:—the key was demanded, but its delivery was refused by the holder, some one or two of the party who had assembled, seized the jailor, turned him upside down, and took away the court house key from him with all the other keys that he had belonging to the jail house.

No one, it seems, says our informant, could account for this course of conduct, on the part of the lovers of military discipline. There were, at the time, several prisoners in jail, and no one could account for the amount of friendly feeling that may have been felt for them. The course of conduct created some excited feelings, and the conservators of the peace, on representation of the affair having been made to them, deemedit their duty to endeavor to have thepeace kept, and the majesty of the laws maintained, and the officer, who was thus treated and assaulted, unprovoked, protected, had the violators of the peace summoned to trial, before two squires, who set in judgment for the investigation anddetermining of this matter The examination of the witnesses having gone through with, our informant says, that the decision of the squires, is, that the accused are guilty of the charge alledged against them; (i. e. the thing itself;) and, therefore, imposed a fine of ten dollars, on each of the persons so arraigned; although it was endeavored to be whirled off in a play, by those who had thus interferred with the keeper of the keys.

An appeal, our informant says, is to be taken from the decision of the Squires; but, to what court, he did not say: therefore I cannot tell, whether the appeal will be taken to the Court of Monthly Sessions, or to the Court of Quarter Sessions and Common Pleas, or to the Supreme Court of Liberia. But to whatever court the appeal may be taken, our informant says, that a learned attorney and , intends to defend the appeal;— and further, that he intends to open the eyes of many of the citizens of this Republic, on many subjects, and expose, to conduct them in all ways of confusion and disorder, so as to let it verified, that the reports that has been circulated in regard to that man of honor, is true;—and that in all the places he has lived, and the place in which he now lives, and the places in which he may hereafter, live, that his sole delight is in confusion and disorder.

And our informant says that the learned gentleman intends to make an elaborate speech in support of the appeal, before the court that the appeal may be taken to—to show the citizens of Liberia, that disorder in Government,—in society and in the church, are the concomitant parts in which he delights; and to fill up the measure of the saying, that is said by the  cannassions, who inhabits the western world, that * will never make a nation; and that disorder and confusion will bring up the rear of the short period of time that may exist as a nation. How lamentable it is to hear that such a stand is about to be taken against the maintainance of good order and peace;—and for what, may I ask, is this course to be pursued? to please sensual ambition.

The sonorus voice of the learned gentleman, who, no doubt is the lion of the party, of the appellees, will make the walls of the hall of Justice ring with the eloquence of a "Cicero;"—and like the A then on "Solor," become a lawgiver, and dictator general to Liberia.

Then if it is sportive and amusing play for deputy officers of the government and attornies law, to become leaders in such a course of conduct, and then for them to be backed by those who ought to discountenance such behaviour, in any portion of the people among they live;—we had as well bout ship and go ashore.

The opener of the eyes o the blind and the revealer of many of the hidden secrets of Liberia, will be followed by some able speaker no doubt.

There is a very important secret about Monrovia, and that is, Cape Messurado has stood so long in one position, with so many valuable jewels of wealth laying concealed in its bosom; and now the cape is to be turned upside down, as was the poor jailor, and then the eyes of many citizens will be opened to behold the rich jewels of the earth, as they will be opened to behold, that any person have a right to arrest the keys of public buildings from the hands of him who holders them by lawful authority.

We hope that to whatever court the appeal may be taken to, that the court may do the appellees the honor to confirm the decision of the squires;—so that turbulance may be awed into quietude;—and that others who may be disposed to act a miss, may profit by the pass.

LIBERIA HERALD.

Mr. Herald,

There are some things, that are not redeculous, but ludicrous When I was first informed, that Mr. Dennis had employed the pen of a certain student of boasted erudition to write for him, and humbug my humble endeavoues to ameliorate the condition of suffering and dying emigrants, I said it would only help the good cause. I hardly thought this "cats paw," writing big things over the name of "little Henry," would make him look in the eyes of all who knew him, like a little boy in Daddy's big boots, with Dad's Hat on. A big segar and a doll baby, would finish the picture. Mr. Herald, I can write fun and nonsense too, to the hearts content, but the subject was one, that admitted none of this kind of Tom Foolery. And I will just tell little Henry and his Freddie scholar too, that so far as they in folly oppose a work of mercy and necessity, they write more to their disgrace, than to their honor. I would not have noticed the pert and flippant production at all, but that some friends thought it would be well to answer "a fool according to his folly," even though an over grown student was his "Cats paw." Mr Dennis too should have heard me out; over my letter I wrote. "No 1;" through I am told, for my paper I have not got ten, that the "No 1" is out, and many typographical errors appear. I hope all who read will excuse me. as I cannot get the proof sheet, being fourteen miles from the office I have, however, requested a young gentleman to do the kindness of getting the paper, correcting, and punctuating, a work never supposed to be, nor do I know it to be a part of an Editors duty here. This is a matter so generally complained of, that I commonly let it go. Mr Herald, when in the course of things, events happen that elicit human sympathy,—when we see effects produced all around us, such as the great mortality among our late emigrants; the question arises at once, what is the cause? We see the thing. It is plain before our eyes. The facts exist, acknowledged by our opponents, and mourned over by all. Would a man wishing to remedy the great evil, charge upon the wrong agent, the cause of effects, so alarming? Justice says no. In relation to these emigrants, I have heard Doctors fearfully charged, as the cause of their death. But I am not convinced of this. Observation seems to say they are not the "cat to bell." Mr Dennis, "the fact is we greatly need Physicians.' This being the case, they cannot be blamed for any sufferings of emigrants; "why bell the wrong cat"? We too have heard Agents charged with selling the emigrants provision, pushing them in houses next to out doors, sticking them up in little hot garrets, leting them suffer for nurses, lay and die on floors Some of which I believe to be untrue;—and consequently was reluctant in making charges on a man, who once at least, fed emigrants one or two weeks after six months were gone by, which raised him somewhat in my estimation, as "a humane." Beside this, he was positively so "humane" as to come up nearly once a month to see the sick! Which was such a strange thing before the day of his agency, (nor did the "Asylum" make him puke either,) that I thought him positively "diligent." Since I wrote however, he has become comparitively "humane" and "diligent," and has been up every two weeks and brought a Doctor with him, though six months are gone! I think a little more brushing, will make him some thing extra, and I have the hope of seeing him superlatively "humane" and "diligent," and come up every week, and look after the sick and suffering. More than all this, seven months are past, provision is still extended, I hope, if really needed, eight months, will not end the benevolence. G. on young men, I will never hold you in, rather would I clap on the whip and spur until all the things complained off be remedied. But whence all this power and privilege now? Have Agents all ways had it? If so I am ready to "hell" a cat" at once But I should be sorry to find Mr Dennis with a bell on his neck, ringing his knell, as one any way involved in these deaths and suffering He seems to treat the subject very lightly, but as no human man will play with death and suffering, unemployed widows surrounded with famishing orphans, as it is rather a matter of sorrow and mourning, I must pause and reflect, as to the kind of humanity put forth. Mr Dennis had no cause to come forth under the circumstances and try to prevent, and throw discredit upon acknowledged wants, by himself acknowledged. As though our emigrants were years fed charity students, like his "cats paw," who knows not how to sympathise with a poor set of people commonly pitched out of rented houses in six months, debilitated, sick, unable to labour, and no employments, if they could away from drawn lands, Mr Dennis should have rather helped up and on this needed aid, especially as so little of it would have come out of his pocket, or out of the mouth of his student. The colonization Society I have heard charged, because their were not; or is not houses in the right places, nor sufficient medical men to meet the crying wants of the emigrants, they send to this county. The charge of being miss-led by statements, painted with "too much red in the brush," by some of the Societies traveling Agents, which it is alledged prevents emigrants coming to the country as well prepared as they might come. I was not prepared to join in any tirade, against the Col: Soc, because that Society unwillingly might have a few unfaithful Agents, in Africa and America. Wny oring this "Noblest of all societies" into disrepute, even if I could, and contradict all I ever read of their motives and designs, from themselves and remove an impression from my own mind in their favor, when no colonizationist with whom I am acquainted (and I know a few) ever gave any known cause for it. Liberia, a monument to honor that society name, would become insulted, her freemen would think me at least not cautious, and her officers think I dealt unjustly to deal thus without proof Why should I make philanthrophy an injustice and bring but what they are? Mr Dennis opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. I have learned over and over, that Mr D. the A. C. S's. functionary here, "that some assert has as much power over our soil" as "the people of Liberia themselves," thinks, I should charge upon his principal. Because he will presist in declaring the Col. Soc, knows of all these causes of suffering, and because I learn he can bring evidence to prove that he has laid these subjects, especially as to houses, before the Rev W. Mc Lain at Washington, their chief corresponding organ, and has held, I hear, correspondence with that Rev. gentleman. Well how was I to know, this? And is Mr Mc Lain the Col: Soc? Did a majority, of that society see this correspondence? If so did they refuse to act? What evidence have I of all this? especially on the "other hand," when I learn it is provable, that the Rev Wm: Mc Lain has writen to this powerful African, functionary, to go a head, erect houses and regardless of the expence, in cases of necessity! surely then this leaves us room to plead not guilty for Mr Mc Lain. But Mr Dennis, on the just ground "that he wants every man to shoulder his own baggage, and to lay the blame where it belongs," requests the writer in his next, with proof that will convict and burn, and "come to the point," presists in attempting to fasten the charge on the Am, Col; Soc, that "a want of s: table cases for the accomodation of emigrants" as this fact should have been made known to be so by their agent, and if he has not done this his indespensible duty, then he is no longer the "manor" and acts as Sir Oracle and for this, nature is highly censurable. But hear him. what as a proof that the society has been properly informed on this point, I beg to call the writer's attention to a polished letter of mine in the New York Col: Journal addressed to the Rev: J. B Pinney Sec: N. Y. Col. Soc. the early part of last year." But there is a million of people composing that Soc. Did Mr Dennis state things clearly and impartially! Now Mr. Dennis I had these acknowledged facts, as to doctors and houses. I stated them, and doing so, stated just what Mr D. had done, as he attempts to prove. But I stated facts, not knowing who to call guilty of such fearful outrage; and why is Mr Dennis angry with me and not angry with himself? Is he angry because I tell a truth, that claims to have been told before me, it simply because he was so fortunate as to be his own witness, in his own case, and I was not ready to make any man, or set of men, shoulder such a "luggage" as this pitiable, sorrowful, suffering and dying load; not a very honorable one to the guilty. Yes Mr Dennis, I will come to the point, in fact do, but show him to me; and I will point out the principle; be he who he may. "Their is blame some where," show it to me, and you will find me, not just so chicken hearted as you pretend to suppose, I am not done with D's letter either.

A. F. RUSSELL.

Of all the members of the Convention Mr. Randolph excited the greatest curiosity. Not a word that fell from his lips escaped the public ear, not a movement the public eye. When he arose to speak, the empty galleries began to fill, and when he ended, and the spell was dissolved, the morning passed away. It was on the 14th of November he made his first speech. The word passed through the city in an instant that Randolph was speaking, and soon the house, the lobby, and the gallery were crowded almost to suffocation. He was evidently ill at ease when he began his speech, but soon recovered himself when he saw the telling effect of every sentence that he uttered. He spoke nearly two hours, and throughout that time every eye was fixed upon him, and among the most attentive of his hearers were Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe who had not heard him before since his rupture with the administration of their preuecessor in the Presidency. From that day he addressed the body with perfect self-possession, and although he did not at any subsequent time speak at length he frequently mingled with marked ability in debate; and it was easy to tell from the first sentence that fell from his lips when he was in fine tune and temper, and on such occasions the thrilling music of his speech fell upon the ear of that excited assembly like the voice of a bird singing in the pause of the storm. It is difficult to explain the influence which he exerted in that body. He inspired terror to a degree that even at this distance of time seems inexplicable. He was feared alike by East and West, by friend and foe. The arrows from his quiver, if not dipped in poison, were pointed and barbed, rarely missed the mark, and as seldom failed to make a rankling wound. He seemed to paralyze the mind and body of his victim. What made his attack more vexatious, every sarcasm took effect amid the plaudits of his audience. He called himself on one occasion a tomahawk and a scalper, and true to the race from which he sprung, he never explained away or took back anything; and, as he knew the private as well as the public history of every prominent member it was impossible for his opponents to [illegible] from what quarter and on whom his arrow would fall. He also had political accounts of long standing to settle with sundry individuals and none could tell when the day of reckoning would arrive. And when it did come, it was a stern and fearful one. What unnerved his opponents was a conviction of his invulnerability apparent or real; for, unconnected as he was by any social relation, and ready to fall back on a colossal fortune, he was not on equal terms with men who were struggling to acquire a competency, and whose hearts were bound by all the endearing ties of domestic love. Moreover, it was impossible to answer a sneer or a sarcasm with an argument. To attempt any thing of the kind was to raise a laugh at one's expense. Hence the strong and weak in a contest with him were upon the same level.

In early youth the face of Mr. Randolph was beautiful and its lineaments are in some degree preserved in his portrait by Stuart; but, as he advanced in life it lost its freshness, and began to assume that aspect which the poet Moore described in his diary as a young-old face and which is so faithfully portrayed by Harding. His voice, which was one of the great sources of his power, ranged from tenor to treble. It had no base notes. Its volume was full at times; and, though heard distinctly in the hall and the galleries, it had doubtless lost much of the sweetness and roundness of earlier years. He was, too, though he had the art to conceal his art from common observers a consummate actor. In the philosophy of voice and gesture, and in the use of the pause, he was as perfect an adept as ever trod the boards of Covent Garden or Drury Lane. When he described Chapman Johnson as stretching his arm to intercept and clutch the sceptre as it was passing over Rockfish Gap, or when he rallied him for speaking not "fifteen minutes as he promised, but two hours, not by Shrewsbry clock, but by as good a watch as can be made in the city of London," and, opening the case of his hunting watch, held it up to the view of the chairman; or, when seeking to deride the length of Johnson's speech, he said: "The gentleman said yesterday, or the day before, or the day before that." Garrick or Kean would have crowned his action with applause. No weight of character, no grade of intellect, afforded a shield impenetrable by his shafts.—Probably the committee to which was referred near its close all the resolutions of the Convention with a view of having them drawn in the form of a Constitution, was the most venerable in years, in gouts, in all the accomplishments of the human mind and in length and value of public service, that ever sat on this side of the Atlantic. Madison, Marshall, Tazewell, Doddridge, Watkins Leigh Johnson and Cooke were the seven members who composed it. Yet Mr. Randolph, almost without an effort, raised a laugh at their expense. It appears, if I am not mistaken, that some qualification of the right of suffrage, which was embraced in the resolutions, was not to be found in the reported draft, and to this omission Mr. Randolph called the attention of the house. Mr. Leigh observed that if Mr Randolph's views were carried out, it would virtually leave the entire regulation of the right of suffrage to the General Assembly.

Randolph replied with all his peculiar emphasis and gesture; "Sir, I would as soon trust the house of burgesses of the commonwealth of Virginia as the committee of seven." I followed his finger, and amid the roar of laughter which burst forth, I saw Mr. Madison and Mr. Leigh ablench, and unconsciously bow their heads. He idolized Shakspeare, and cherished a taste for the drama; and in this department of literature as well as in that of the older English classics from Elizabeth to Anne, and indeed, in all that was embraced by the curiosity and taste of a scholar, his library was rich. He spoke, and wrote the English language in all its purity and elegance, and his opponents had at least the gratification of knowing that they were abused in good English. Indeed, Madison could not vie with him in a full and ready control over the vocabulary or the harmony of the English tongue. His later speeches exemplify this remark in a more striking manner than his earlier ones. In his speech on Retrenchment delivered in the House of Representatives in 1828, one meets with sentences of great beauty, and it may be observed, that towards the close of that speech is one of the few pathetic touches to be found in his productions. Yet it may be well doubted whether his speeches will hold a high place in after times. His sayings will be quoted in the South, and some of his speeches will undoubtedly be read; but they will hardly emerge beyond Mason and Dixon's line, and never reach even within that limit the dignity of models. What Sir James McIntosh observed to an American respecting one of his speeches will probably convey, which oral tradition grows into impressions which they make on impressible minds, and there was a striving after effect—a desire to say smart or hard things even to the author. On the score of argument they were beneath criticism. It is but just, however, to say that Mr. Randolph protested against the authenticity of most of the speeches attributed to him. Those in the published debates of the Convention are undoubtedly authentic, and must have received his revisal. But of his eloquence thus much may fairly be said, that it fulfilled its office in its day and generation; for it is unquestionably his praise that above all his cotemporaries he was successful in fixing the attention of his audience of every class and degree throughout his longest speeches. The late Timothy Pitkin, a competent judge, who had known Randolph many years in Congress, observed at a time when it was fashionable to compare Tristram Burgess with him, that you may as well compare the broadsword of a mosstroper with the Scymitar of Saladin. When it is remembered that Mr. Randolph, at all times infirm, was sometimes during the winter of the Convention in his own opinion at the point of death, it is a fact of great import, that at no other period of his career did he speak with more judgment and acuteness, nor on any other occasion did he so entirely gain the regards of the people of Eastern Virginia, or his genius excite greater admiration than by his exhibition in that body.—Am: Paper.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald.

In answer to Mr. Dennise's question. "Why complain to the Society?" Twice repeated. I ask other questions. Whose Agents travel over the United States canvassing the country to raise and interest in behalf of colonization? What Society is it that promises emigrants, proper medical attention, house room, food, and that on coming to Liberia, emigrants shall have lands in those places where they wish to settle? The colonization society makes these promises to emigrants. And should not such promises made in good faith, be faithfully fulfilled? They should be; or in good faith it should be made known to all wishing to emigrate; that they will not get medical attention, for the want of medical men (some will have it the careless attention of some Physicians, as well as this want,) they may lay on the floor in some old off room somewhere, burning with fever, and not see a doctor in two months, and if, often he, the Dr may complain that he has not suitable medicine, and must hurry on, scores of emigrants and private practice awaits him twenty miles off, that they may take fever, die, be buried and never see a Physician; and if so, never more than once a day no a week or month before he gets around again. This would be truth. 2nd That for want of houses to accommodate them, not being obtainable in any one place, they must be scattered to the four winds, in different settlements, even families seperated, often never to meet again in the flesh. 3rd That the rooms they do get, are often over crowded; large families in little rooms not often over 12 by 12 feet; out of repair, leckey, new and half done only, old thatch, matted and exposed, low, little, lofts, mostly bedless men and women, heaped pell mell, or very little conveniences for sick females, even for the most private purposes, when unable to walk. Often nurses are long delayed, inattentive, and according to united testimony of nearly all emigrants all of them are not killed with "the best policy," honesty.

4. That most of them, must from causes above named; stop five or twenty miles from the place they intend settleing, hoping to get soon through with fever; but six months finds them very often sicker and weaker. During this time money if any; clothes and almost every necessary are sold, what should have been supplied. Notice to leave rented houses, and "Golgoth" too comes, The last Drawing day! and the provision boat runs not. "Money gone," according to the old adage, "friends few." Sick, week, poor, helpless; almost they must stagger to or get to, their drawn land, and that place some how. To live on what? on what? Let the curtain fall. Look at the grave and ask its victory. 5 Or they must "make hay while the sun shines." be diligence during six, months; lucid months, weeks, and days; they have lands chosed, in the desired settlement, five or 15 miles off. Travel, work, walk, and pull in rain and sun, sick or well, pull fell new logs, clear ground, build, often forced to walk from 5 to 10 miles a day; and pull from Virginia, form Monrovia, to some point on the rive once a week &c; and must during their days off from family; in new grounds be exposed to the action of the elements, sun and rain, with many inconveniences, over heated &c. The result is—let the curtain fall. O Death! 6 That suitable houses such as were once in Liberia, built in the different settlements at inconsiderable cost, heardly the cost of house rent, coffins, graves, other things, and no little misery beside, would place them, in most settlements where they wish to locate near arable lands, where the cool of the morning and evening, or after-noon, could be spent in clearing, knocting up their cabbins, planting crops they could retire from the storm and piercing sun, subject to no unnecessary exposure, but on the contrary engaged in healthy labour, advantagious in acclimation. At the end of six months, good crops, of potators, corn, beens, pees, hens and chickins to Africa are a blessing a live giving country, not a grave yard. But alas! this reasonable thing is not done; and if a man writes about them, and says it should be, their are certain "speculators" in Liberia, united with some of a like clan of "wolfs in sheeps dress" in America, who will raise a cabal try to lie down the truth, and bully—such temerity out of the land if they could do it, but these are facts. But I am very unfortunate, to have "done by implication" that which I tried so honestly not to do. Mr. Dennis says I "censured the Agents and Physicians after all." and must die for it. I suppose mercy on me, what did I say? "Every emigrant agent and doctor lives at Monrovia." Truth Lord. It is so. "The doctors had increasing private practice" Truth again. "The Agents were increasing in mercantile business." I knew Mr. Jordon the New York agent was, and is a merchant. I did not know he had failed. "He has not." I knew [illegible] emigrants to, [illegible] few, acclimating in Monrovia. Nor did I allude parties [illegible] to him, as I did not think his business conflicted. But I said "I believed so." If so stated I am sorry, but I did not. As for Mr. Dennis, without fearing any "departure from strict veracity," he does sell pork, beef, [illegible] beens, pees, cloth and tobacco, by the Bbl, Cwt, bushel, piece, hogshead; just as these things are sold by other merchants. And for a just equivolent, I thought they were imported too, and such as are sold in the market. I believe "it is generally understood" he does business for the society, or some of its "speculators" I doubt that he does "every bit" for it, or them. I cannot say "no business, but" I fear little Henry has not just cut his eye teeth," and "knows how to look out for A, No: 1, and no mistake." I buy and hundreds buy. I knew, I will add, if for the society, I hope they get the heavy profits. I hope further, that emigrants provision will not be so sold again, as to reduce their rations, again chiefly to red rice, and rotten beef, to cause dissentary, and death, not over stocked with Physicians as we are not. His erudite student writer, in frolicing over my words, meant to be conditional. Says more for Mr. D. there I gave him authority to say. I must call in his commission a little. "The blame does not rest on the Physician." Unless he can do two mens work and his own too. Not this one, whose diligence passed him up twice and down twice a week. When able to go, who can murmer at this? When duty or something else, in time past, did not suffer the doctor to pass as often in two months as twice, "nor the Agent." No, if he has no power to prevent these evils producing death, he is not to blame either. But if the agent has power, and I am told he is very powerful if he is empowered to build, and repair and give aid, medical and in provision, as he has been doing since I wrote, if he can get better, or has power to provide better fare, dwellings &c. and has let so many suffer all along without doing so, as has been the case; if he could have prevented all this coming through rain; and exposure, and has not done so, until now, he is more of a hideous monster than I thought him to be; deserving to be haunted by the Ghosts of the many dead, hauled from his pillow by departed spirits of the husbands of widows, and to have upon him the execration of many an orphan. I will no longer wonder that I am blamed for not charging directly upon him many faults. I did not see or know. Agents write to an eminent Preacher of the Gospel in Monrovia; that we have given your African Agents authority to build necessary houses, what more can we do, must we come and build them ourselves? After all this I must believe, without evidence, that, that Noble Society, that believes its wishes are carried out, and its promises fulfilled towards emigrants in full, and whose ever truly Philanthropic hand, will be ready to supply the absolutely necessary wants, as Parent of its new born children by every vessel. I to suit a cash ad. must believe that a very few knows of all this suffering and death, from causes above and before stated. And am asked, "why complain to the society? As though it, in all grace, should not provide for its emigrants, and not have our land filled with widows and orphants. When I repeat it, could be so easily prevented; and am asked "if it is not high time for Liberia to help her self, as an independant people! Profound ignorance. Who has been picking up, for the last fifteen years, the emigrants dropped at six months? being often helpless, in the midst of fever, with their widows and orphans, bearing one half the expence of Colonization? no man contributing to our aid? No poor house. Mr. D. come this way, and we will tell you other important facts, not revealed in monthly visits.

"REPUBLICAN WHIG" COMMITTEE ROOMS

No 99 Broad St. Monrovia.

Wanted:—a "sound reliable man" to accept the "Republican Whig" nomination to fill the vacancy in the House of Representatives of this Republic, occasioned by the death of the late Sion Harris.

No one need apply who has not the following qualifications: He must be fully qualified to represent the whole catalogue of "Republican Whig" principles with all the bombast of thorough ultraism. He must be able to show that he can be all things to all men without being any thing particular himself; therefore he must be the champion of all isms, while, at the same time, quite incapable of holding a distinct opinion of his own, or of speaking an emphatic word on any subject of public interest. Brains are not a necessary qualification. The duties of the office do not require brains—indeed, such an article will be regarded as "of doubtful constitutionality". The nominee, if elected by the "Republican Whig" ticket, must content himself to be led by the nose.

According to the opinion of the Sentinel—"this people not very generally so well informed in governmental policy."—it is doubtful that any one can be found in Liberia with the necessary "gumption," or with quite nerve enough to accept the nomination; it is therefore requested that the "Republican Whig" Journals—if such there be—of the United States will copy this advertisement, and forward their bills to the Chairman of the "Republican Whig" Committee.

It is also requested, Mr Editor, that you will give this notice a prominent place in your columns; and should you succeed in ferriting out a suitable candidate, a vote of thanks shall be your reward.

Very truly yours
JOHN SNOOKS. Chairman

From the Liberia Sentinel

MR. EDITOR: Having seen in the Herald of the 19th. inst: a piece under the head of "Our obligations which reflects indiscriminately upon all Emigrants; I wish through the medium of your paper. to notice a remark, which is insulting. and unmerited after making several observations, about the duties which each and every citizen owes to his Government, and the community in which he lives, he says "these remarks are not called forth from any recent occurrence nor can we say there ever has been an occasion, when the Police officers have not been able to suppress any riot, and maintain the dignity of the Law. But in view of the great influx of Emigrants who never knew what it was to live free and under wholesome laws, and ignorant of the noble principles which should influence every freeman; we have thought it prudent thus to state distinctly, what we conceive to be the duty of the people of Liberia to their country &c." I would ask who is this Daniel come to Judgement! And what does he know of the ability or inability of Emigrants? and of their appreciation of liberty? He speaks as though he (and all Old Settlers I suppose) knows more about freedom, and Good government than any New comer possibly can know, though we just come from a country, one of the freest and most enlightened on the globe, and himself for near a Quarter of a century separated from the civilized World, and living in a land covered with gross darkness, which, like that of Egypt may be felt: To hear him speak of free Government and the noble principles of freemen; we might suppose that his name could be found amongst the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, or that some of his ancestors were among the steel clad warriors of old England, when sword in hand they compelled John, to sign the Magna Charta. But I would ask, what was the writer, and the rest of the Old settlers, when they, first came over here (for I suppose, he was not born here) were they not Emigrant? I think they were, and men who had not been in the possession of liberty, and self government all their lives neither; and yet who will say that they were not capable of self government? but they were ignorant of the noble principles which influence freemen; no one I think will have the hardihood to say so; and if he dare, I would advise him to wait; until this month has passed, otherwise our glorious Natal day which is near at hand will give him the lie, it being an annual Memento of their capability for self government, and their principles as freemen. DELTA.

Remarks—Our readers, will we presume read the above with as much surprise as we did. We are sure that none need be told that the bombast of "Delta" scarcely deserves a passing notice: but as we always stand ready to defend whatever appears in our editorials, it is not prudent to pass by unnoticed, all kinds of absurdities which may be leveled at us as if we were afraid of the "doe-faces." The Herald has been for the last twenty years advocating the interests of Liberia—at all times it has tried to do its duty faithfully and it cannot be imagined by any one who are acquainted with our strait—forwardness, that we will now shrink from what we conceive to be a paramount duty. The remarks which "Delta" takes exceptions to—(those we actually used) we are willing to reitterate if it is necessary. We do not indiscriminately class all emigrants alike—some of them are intelligent, and fully capable of appreciating and understanding their duties and obligations as citizens of a free state—but there are others, who compose more than two thirds of all most every emigration who do not, and many of them will readily admit it. This is no fault of theirs. "Delta" may shoot his darts at us when he likes—they will prove harmless ones. If in this case he is trying to make capital for an electioneering campaign we can only say to him—go on gain your point if you can—we have nothing to do with your plans and pitiful contrivances:—Nor will we in future, descend to notice such effusions, emanating certainly, from adisordered mind. We have been in Liberia more than thirty years, and had the honor too, of being one of the signers of the "Declaration" of Liberia's. "Independence,' and have always taken great pleasure in welcoming our brethern on their arrival here from the land of oppression, and when circumstances allow it, we give them a hearty welcome, and advise them to prepare themselves for the duties and responsibilities which the change in their altered circumstances require of them. Our Liberian readers will readily understand the motives of "Delta" and will no doubt, appreciate his views, and give him credit, at least, for what he has said, —especially for his inimitable style of bombast—

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, AUGUST 16th, 1854.

"Elijah Johnson" in our last issue attacks us in a manner which we are not disposed to pass by silently. He charges us with taking up the cudgel of Lott Cary, and attempting to inflict upon his head a severe castigation. We plead not guilty to both of these charges, and we take this occasion to proclaim to all persons, that we have no desire to forestall public opinion, nor to oppose principles which we believe emanate from a pure mind. But we claim the right at all times, to speak our honest sentiments, notwithstanding it may not suit the purposes of Elijah Johnson. Let the question of our foreign relations, become a topic of general speculation, and our opinion is, that "Lott Cary" will have two thirds of the people of Liberia. advocating the sentiments he advances. Indeed; from the short discussion, which has already passed through our columns—the subject has become one, second to none in importance, and we doubt not but the people will very soon shew their predilection to his doctrines in a way not to be misunderstood.

These remarks are forced from us. We have no wish to discuss subjects of a political character, and we beg that our friends will not force us into such matters. In referring to the subject at all, we intended simply, to have it known that we did not know who Elijah Johnson was, and it was not our intention to be understood as siding with Lott Cary, we can have no objection, however, to be classed with such a correspondent.

Elijah Johnson would make a mountain of this expression—we leave out of the question the unfavorable aspect such a state of things would have on the aboriginees of the country. Refer to our paper of July 5th: and our readers will readily understand the connection in which this remark was used—we meant nothing more than this—that if our merchants could not compete with foreign merchants and be compelled to haul up their vessels thereby lessening the intercourse they have maintained with the natives they would naturally inquire into the cause, and the result would be in their opinion that the Liberian merchant could not carry on a trade like the foreigners, and they must be factors only. Would Liberia not lose her respect with the aboriginees under such circumstances?

The Weather:—During the last fifteen or twenty days, the weather has been unusually wet and boisterous—wind strong from the west and southwest. Great fears are entertained for the safely of the rice crops.

Marine Intelligence:—The French brig Maria, C. Dupont, Master, lying at Grand Bassa parted her chains on the 5th inst, and narrowly escaped being driven on shore. She, however, succeeded in gaining the open sea, and, without an anchor, proceeded to this place. Not being able to procure—though the Captain made every exertion to do so—either from the shipping in the harbor or from the shore, suitable anchors and chains—she cleared on the 8th for France; leaving some ten or twelve thousand gallons Palm Oil on shore at Grand Bassa.

—The American barque Shirley, Hall, Master, at Grand Bassa on the 1st inst; and not liking the appearance of the weather, run up to Monrovia, where she arrived on the 2nd. Sailed again for Grand Bassa on the 7th.

—Arrived on the 6th inst, British barque Royalist, Spence, Master, from London on a trading voyage along the Liberien coast. Sailed on the 8th for the leeward.

—Arrived on the 7th French Ship Cingfreres, C. Chevalier, Commander, in search of emigrants for French Guyana. Sailed same day for Grand Cape Mount. This emigration enterprise is under the supervision of the French Government, and the Cingfreres has a French Naval officer on board to see that emigration is voluntary. She has on board some twenty from Goree, and about forty from Sierra Leone. Liberia, we guess, is rather a dull Market for such commodity.

——Arrived 12th inst, Hamburg barque Adolph Hermingson Master, 46 days from Hamburg—consigned to C. Gocidelt Esqr; on a trading voyage along the Liberian coast.

——Arrived 15th inst American Schooner H. N. Gambrell J. Upton Master from New York via Gambia.

In our last, for want of space, we omitted to note the arrival at this place, on the 30th ultimo, of the ship Sophia Walker, N. H. Gray, master, from Norfolk and Savannah with a large company of emigrants; about one half of whom was landed at Grand Bassa previous to her arrival here. We regret to learn that much sickness prevailed on board the Sophia Walker during the passage out,—mostly among the children, some twenty of whom died before reaching Grand Bassa, and eight or ten soon after being landed. It is stated that the sickness was caused principally by the use of "bad" water.

By the Sophia Walker we have an addition of two M D's to the medical staff of the Republic. We welcome, with a hearty good will, Doctors Laing and Snowden; and though we cannot wish them abundant practice in the healing art—we do wish them much success in the cases which may claim their attention and if not able to live comfortably by the practice of medicine, alone they may make themselves useful citizens in many other respects.

——We are gratified to state that a larger portion than we had expected of the Harp's cargo has been saved from the wreck—though in a very damaged condition.

The emigrants by the Harp, destined for Grand Bassa, are still here. These people complain bitterly of the treatment they received during the passage from the U. S to this place. The head man of the company, Bede Jourdon, informs us that, besides other harsh treatment, the rations served out to them were most scanty—barely sufficient to sustain life. It is hoped that Agents of the Society in America will look into this matter, and take measures to prevent such abuses in future.

NAVAL

The U. S. Ship Dale, captain W C. Whittle arrived here on the 4th inst from a cruise on the South Coast all well. The Dale brings no news of importance. She sailed on the 8th for Porto Praya.

Arrived on the 5th inst Government Schooner Lark, R. Cooper Esqr, commanding, from Kinsoo via Trade Town and Grand Bassa, Passengers master and crew of the British barque Wellington wrecked near Sanguin; also the crew of the Liberian sloop Anna Maria wrecked near Trade Town point. The Lark experienced very heavy weather during her cruise, and returns here with loss of an anchor, and several spars

Marine Disasters:—On the morning of the 31st ultimo, the British barque Wellington, John Adamson, Master, bound to Australia was stranded on the rocks near Sanguin, thirty three miles north-west of Sinou. A Liberian trader from Greenville, Sinou, who chanced to be at Sanguin, prosecuting his trade, at the time, contributed greatly to the rescue of the master and crew of the Wellington from the threatening violence of the natives; and aided them in saving some of their personal effects—with which, they took refuge in their boats, and on board a small Liberian vessel at anchor in the roads, in charge of the Liberian trader above alluded to, who, it appears had agreed to convey them to Greenville, Sinou—the nearest Liberian settlement. But strange to say, on the morning of the 1st inst,—the master and crew of the Wellington—without the slightest previous intimation—seized and bound, with cords, the crew of the Liberian vessel, cut her chain, and made sail for Sierra Leone. The second day out, however, they fell in with the Liberian Government schooner "Lark" off Trade Town Point. Captain Cooper, of the Lark, received the master and crew of the Wellington on board his vessel, and conveyed them to this place; where they are provided for by her Britannic Majesty's Consul.

Having transferred the ship-wrecked seamen to the Lark, the Anna Maria—the vessel seized—attempted to make her way back to Sanguin. The wind, at the time, was blowing strong from the west-ward, and notwithstanding every exertion to gain the open sea—her only anchor having been cut away by the master and crew of the Wellington—she was driven onshore and wrecked. The crew succeeded in reaching Grand Bassa, where they too were received on board the Lark.

The conduct of Captain Adamson, in seizing the vessel, Anna Maria, is—to say the least of it—very remarkable; as we are assured that no application was made to the parties in charge of the Anna Maria further than to convey Captain Adamson and his crew to Sinou; which was readily agreed to; and that had any other reasonable request been made it would have been met. Had application been made by Captain Adamson, to be conveyed to a place of safely, and his application refused, there might be some reasonable excuse for the course he pursued. And what was the necessity of binding the men, only three in number, and cutting the chain of the vessel—leaving her without an anchor?

The Anna Maria and cargo were owned by Mr S. Dickerson, of Greenville, Sinou; and embraced nearly the whole of his property, as well as his means of a livelihood. Unless remunerated—as in deed he ought to be, and we doubt not will be—the loss to him will be very severe.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

John H. Cheeseman, to be Judge of the Court of Quarter Session and Common Pleas—Grand Bassa County.

Henry H. Whitfield, to be Chairman of the Monthly and Probate court—Grand Bassa county.

John A. Fuller, to be High Sheriff for the county of Monsterrado.

ITEMS.

The "New Orleans Chronicle" says—that "the late decision on the Mc Donough will secures to the American Colonization Society $30.000 per annum for forty years to come. This is good news for those who wish to emigrate to Liberia"

Frederick Douglass in his paper, in speaking of John Mitchell, the Irish traitor, says—that "he loves liberty as the wolf loves the lamb. He would be free himself, only to devour the freedom of others"

The native man who murdered Edward Johnson some five years ago at Junk, has been arrested; and tried before the Quarter Court at Grand Bassa, at its last Session—he was convicted, and the third friday in last month was to have been executed. The President, for want of certain information, respited the prisoner until the fourth friday in this month.

The British Mail Steamer "Forerunner," arrived here on the 9th of July bound home. She had her complete compliment of passengers, and a full cargo of African produce.

The trading season has somewhat declined, but not to that extent as was anticipated.

The British Mail Steamer "Bacchante" did not complete her voyage—some of her machinary got out of order, and she made the best of her way, under sail, to Sierra Leone.

We learn, there is every possibility of a rupture between the United States and Spain. No one need be told, that the main object of the Americans, is to get possession of Cuba, and thereby extend, further, the accursed system of slavery. All good people will look to England and France to prevent the consumation of so despicable an act.

A fine Steam vessel fitted out in England, to ascend the Niger—passed here, on her way down, a few weeks ago.

Two fine sized vessels are on the stocks, in this city, and are nearly finished—the largest one belongs to Hon: Dan: B. Warner, and will be the finest vessel ever built in Liberia—the other the property of Mr Harrison Murry. They will be launched next month.

Almost every day, barrels of sugar and syrup are brought to our market, by the farmers on the St: Pauls.

☞ Not at all complimentary.—A Frenchman traveling in the United States, sends the following sketch of a "genuine Yankee," to a parisian journal

"Picture to yourself, if you please a lean figure with long wrists; feet with dimensions that would forever tarnish the escutcheon of of a gentleman; a hat stuck upon the back of the head, straight hair, mouth stretched from ear to ear by a lump of tobacco; lips stained yellow by the juice of the same weed, a black coat with narrow skirts; a tumble shirt; no gloves of a gendarme; trowsers in harmony with the rest of the equipment; and you will have before you the exact portrait of a thorough bred Yankee."—American Paper.

POETRY.

For the Liberia Herald

EULOGY ON THE INSTITUTIONS OF LIBERIA.

Liberia hail! thy sons shall see the light,
The veil shall be uncover'd to their sight;
They'll rush right onward bursting thro' the night,
And thro' the shades of darkness they will fight.
Liberia's schools of learning ope their doors,
The scholars enter—mark upon their floors;
Raise up their tuneful voice to heaven's height,
And say—To have this art, our souls we'll plight.

Rear up your heads to heaven, Afric's schools,
And let they sons all learn sweet wisdom's rules
Exalt thy fame on eagle's wings, and soar,
Beyond this space, where thunders loudly roar,
Bear forth the news thro' heaven's wide expanse,
That all thy sons have caught the pure substance;
That mounts the skies, and soars around this globe,
And then seeks out a site for an abode.

Thy lovely pupils seem thy precepts do,
They seek thy face at nine, and leave at two;
Thy well-bred teachers watch them thro' the day,
And fearing lest they fail to shed a ray—
Put forth new efforts, lest they strive in vain,
To fill the youthful minds, they oft, would fain
Shed forth a tear, invoke the God who reigns,
To touch in mercy, these dear youthful brains.

Then will they learn, and earnest seek to know,
What wisdom, (this good art) on minds bestow;
They'll look beyond this veil to future scenes,
Invoke the heavens for those artful beams
Let all these institutions have success,
To spread the gospel light, may they profess,
And bear upon their notes a joyful sound,
That will resound to earth's remotest bound —

Yea; mount the skies, and soar beyond the sun,
Tuning the heavens as you onward run;
Expecting soon to meet the choirs above,
As they descend to bathe their harps in love.
Then teachers stand, and all your duties fill,
And ye who did to us these buildings will—
Have charity, while thus your goods you give,
And soon you'll roar a loft to heav'n and live.

NEW YEAR'S NIGHT OF AN UNFORTUNATE.

An old man stood in the window on a New Year's night, and, with a look of sad despair, gazed up to the fixed, ever-bright heavens, and down upon the still, pure, white earth, on which no one was now so joyless and sleepless as himself. For his grave lay near by him, covered over with the snow of age, not with the green of youth, and he had brought with him, out of all the riches of life, naught but errors, and diseases, a wasted body, a desolate soul, a breast full of poison, and an old age full of remorse.

The beautiful days of his youth glided around him to-night like spectres, and drew him back to that bright morning when his father brought him to the turningpoint of life's great highway, leading on the right, in the path of virtue, to a broad quiet land, full of light and harvest, and on the left, down through the moletracks of vice, to a black pit, full of poison, of deadly serpents, and a gloomy, sultry vapor. Alas! the serpents hung upon his breast, and the poisondrops upon his tongue, and he knew now where he was. In unutterable sorrow, and well-nigh bereft of sense; he cried out aloud, "Oh, give me back my youth! Oh, my father, bring me again to the turning point of life, that I may make another choice!"

But his father and his youth were gone, long long ago.

He saw the meteor-light darting up from the marshes, and going out in the church-yard, and he exclaimed, "These are the day of my folly!" He saw a star glide from the heavens, glitter in fall, and dissolve in the earth. "That am I," said his foreboding heart, and the serpent-fangs of remorse pierced yet deeper into its wounds. His exalted fancy pictured creeping night-wanderers on the roofs of the houses, the windmill lifted on high its threatening arms, and a mask that had been left behind in the House of the Dead, gradually took on his own features.

In the midst of this [illegible], the music of the New Years's night flowed down from the neighboring tower, like the distant tones of a church lay.

He was more gently moved. He gazed upon the far-off horizon, and around upon the wide earth, and he thought of the friends of his youth, now better and happier than he,—teachers of the world—the fathers of happy children—and blessed beings, and said, "Oh, I too, had I been willing, might slumber as quietly as ye, and with as fearless eyes on this first night of the year! Oh, I too might now be happy, ye dear parents and friends, had I fulfilled your New Years's wishes and precepts!"

In feverish recollection upon the times of his youth, it seemed to him that the mask, bearing his own features, lifted itself up in the House of the Dead; at length, by the working of that strange superstition that see phantoms and spectres in the shades of the New Year's night, it seemed to gather itself into the form of a living youth, in the attitude of the youth of the Capitol, plucking a thorn from his foot—and his own figure, in all the bloom of the spring of life, was in bitter mockery played out before his eyes He could look no longer—he covered up his eyes—a thousand hot, burning tears streamed down upon the white snow—he sighed out gently, comfortless and senseless, "Come back again, season of my youth, come back again."

And it came—for all this had been a frightful dream He was still a youth; it was only his wanderings had been no dream.

But he thanked God that, while yet young, he could turn back from the foul track of vice, and haste to the sunny path that leads to the bright land of harvest.

Turn back with him, young man, if thou art in that erring way! This terrific dream will one day be thy judge; but if thou shouldst then cry out, in bitterful season of youth!" it will never come back again.—N. Y Recorder

JAPAN AND THE JAPANESE.

In their social and domestic life, the Japanese are truly Asiatic. Their females occupy but a subordinate position, although they are permitted to share in all the innocent recreations of their husbands and fathers, and are not held in such jealous seclusion as in some parts of India. Their minds are cultivated with as much care as is bestowed upon the education of the men; and the literature of the country boasts of many female names. They are lively and agreeable companions, and are much celebrated for the ease and elegance of their manners. With all these privileges, they are yet in a state of total dependence; and polygamy and the power of divorce is indulged in to the extreme by the husbands.

Children are brought up in habits of implicit obedience, and all of every rank are sent to schools, where they learn to read and write. Beyond this degree of education, however, the children of the rich are instructed in morals, and the whole art of good behavior, including the minutest forms of etiquette Arithmetic and the science of the almanac, for another important portion of their education, since it would be in the highest degree disgraceful to commence, any important undertaking on an unlucky day. And last, as the finishing study, they are initiated into all the mysteries of the Hara-Kiri, literally meaning "happy dispatch," but which is in reality the mode of self-destruction to which every Japanese of distinction feels bound to resort, upon occasions where his life is at stake from any impending penalty.

At the age of fifteen years the boys have their heads shaved, and they then become members of society. They also received a new name at this time, and invariably upon every advance in rank the old cognomen is changed for a new one. Nor are these the only occasions when this change takes place; no subaltern is allowed to bear the same name with his chief, and therefore when an individual is appointed to a high station, every one under him who chances to be his name-sake, must immediately find and adopt a new name

In marrying, equality of rank between the contracting parties is the first requirement, and when no obstacle of this sort stands in the way, the youth declares his passion by attaching a branch of a certain shrub to the house of the young lady's parents. If this is neglected, so is his suit; if it is accepted, so is the ower; and if the damsel wishes to put her reciprocity of this offer beyond a doubt she forthwith blackens her teeth. Presents, as among most oriental nations, are now exchanged, and often with great ceremony burning her toys, to indicate that she is to be no longer childish, she is presented by her parents with a marriage dress and some articles of household furniture; among which are always a spinning wheel, a loom, and the culinary implements required in a Janpanese kitchen. All this bridal equipment is conveyed in great state to the bridegroom's house, and exhibited on the day of the wedding.—Am: Paper

THE BEARD.

MRS. DARLING'S SECOND CURTAIN LECTURE—TIME. 4 4, A M.—MRS. DARLING FAINLY HEARD.

O dear! oh dear! What a dream I have had! Are you sleeping, Mr. Darling? "You were until I wakened you?" Well, Mr. Darling, it is just the natural retribution for your own folly, for it was no doubt that abominable beard of yours that disturbed my slumbers—I had such a dream! I thought there was a Russian invasion, and that every street in the city was filled with great dirty bearded Russians, who were burning and killing all before them. Now I know Mr. Darling, that it was just thinking so much about your beard that caused me such a dream. "Serve me right for thinking so much about what I have no business with, you say?" Well, I wonder what a woman has business with, if she has no business with her own husband's personal appearance.—Do you, Mr. Darling, think that a wife has no right to insist that her husband should maintain something like the same good looks he displayed when he succeeded in inducing her to agree to spend her life with him. "It is not only the right, but the duty, of both husband and wife to endeavor to improve their personal appearance;" and you, Mr. Darling, call the beard an improvement. Some beards do well enough, but not yours, Mr. Darling. "Wait until it is properly grown before I express an opinion; it is improving every day." Well, Mr Darling, I am waiting, but it is for an opportunity of making you look like other people Can you, Mr. Darling, just tell me one sober-minded, respectable man, in good circumstances, who is wearing either beard or moustache? "The highest personage in the realm, Prince Albert, has always worn his moustache?" Well, now, Mr. Darling, I should say you have made a very unfortunate selection. Do you look upon Prince Albert as a gentleman in good circumstances? Wait till Parliament opens, and we shall see. It's my opinion that the right way for a man to get himself into a scrape is just to follow in the footsteps of Prince Albert. But it's all her Majesty's own fault, for if she had at first set her face against his moustache —"So she did, no doubt." Well, admitted: but she should have made him shave it clean away, and cut short all the rest of his German notions, and it would have been better for him to-day. I think, Mr. Darling, that Prince Albert should be a warning to all husbands to attend to their own business, and let wives manage their own affairs.—Am Paper

EDUCATION OF FEMALES IN FRANCE.

In France the ladies are educated in a manner to make them most agreeable in society; and while all are taught to keep the accounts of household expenses, many of a poorer class are taught book-keeping so thoroughly as to enable them to follow it as a profession. In almost every Paris shop, consequently, the books are kept either by the wife of the shopkeeper, or by some other female employed for the purpose. Thus the French system is, to teach females the useful or agreeable, according to their worldly condition. Our American system is to teach them a little of everything; in fact we take more pains with them than with our boys though it would seem from the results that hitherto our efforts have been none too well directed. While we have female seminaries and colleges in which degrees are conferred, and which produce many shallow and discontented philosophers who immodesly take the rostrum of public meetings, and have began to invade the pulpit, we have very few who can take charge of a husband's counting-room while he is in the direction of other departments of his business. In Paris, you buy a carpet of your upholsterer, who show the goods, makes all the necessary explanations, and sends it home. But when you pay, you walk to the neat mahogany desk where madame sits enthroned behind her large folio ledger, and it is with her you regulate the account. The French tradesman's wife is no mere sleeping partner She takes an active, useful and appropriate part in the management of affairs—she know to what extent the business is prosperous—and is, therefore, never in dangor, like many American wives, of demanding a new carriage or other extravagance, when her husband is on the point of failing. These remarks are suggested by an account of a meeting in London "of the friends and promoters of the Hyde Park College for Young Ladies." If the English will occasionally borrow the notion of their younger brother Jonathan, it is a pity they do not make a wiser choice; it would have been much better, for instance, to have commenced as we did, with common schools for girls.—The Presbyterian Banner.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Editor.—In one two last numbers, of your paper, I noticed a somewhat mischievous controversy being commenced by those who appear to be out of business, and carried to such an unreasonable extent, and, excess that altho' it originated from nothing, it terminates with injurious consequences, unless their polemic fires are quenched; and this, I now essay, by either taking their fire, or demolishing their fuel.

But perhaps, Mr Herald, it would be for me, to drive away the fire—man and engineer, who appear to be a certain Rev. and Hon, A. F. Russel, you know Mr H, that great men generally occupy great places, they fill their gigantic whim, on great occasions.

Now sir, this giant has undertaken a tremendous work, such as would fill the hands, and employ the brain, of twenty men of ordinary power, it seems that he is trying to demolish that splendid fabric,—colonization scheme, and emigration system. But bear in mind, Mr Herald, I do not think, that this active and exulting colonizationist, is actually, trying to injure this great scheme, far from it; I only say that it will have this appearance to many, on whose mind, this patriot, would rather make a better impression.

Now, without traversing the entire rout of Mr Russell, I state the general tenor of his catelogue of objections. point out a few of his inconsistences, and then demonstrate to you him, and the public, a few, inquiries, but unavoidable conclusions.

And first, as to the general complaint, I think he mentions six objects, against which, he alternately, directly and indirectly, hurl a "firery dart" the six are as follows. The Am Col Soc, 1. the agent at Monrovia 2 the 3 medical Doctors 4 and fifth, which is two fold in its nature and structure 6 (you know Mr H fote is a cause, and also, an effect)

Against the above six objects, Mr. A. F. R. has made his anathamatical denunciations, it is useless for me to pretend to say, why R complains, for he does not know, himself; which our next head will show; second, I promised to "point out some of his honor's inconsistencies. And as he is by far, my superior in every respect not only in wealth and station but also in education generally, composition and elocution especially, but nevertheless, I may still do him some good, all of his superiority notwitstanding.

For to let him be the lion and me, the mouse, I might gnaw the fowler's snare from his feet, tho' I had rather let him be "Lupus" and gill the "Crows," andas this last comparison has reference to the wise, prowling, and voracious wolf, which is a proto type of my hon friend) and to the pityful, stand, and long—jibbed crane, which is a "fac simile" of your humble &c &c, I think my voracious friend has a lion in his throate and now while his frightful jaws are extended, I will thrust in my meddling proboscis, extract the painful sting snath out my poor little long instrument of benevolence, and accept an ungrateful growl, for my reward.

Third and lastly. "The consequencies." If "your honor" and Reverend will not desist, you shall soon be striped of those "palms, and laurels of victory and fame" which the community of church and state has delighted to lavish upon you, and you shall be driven from among men, and dwell among things dreary and terrible, caverns, that open, serpents, that hiss, and beasts of prey that howl! BRAND SNATCHER

MENTAL EXCITEMENT.—Bad news weakens the action of the heart, oppresses the lungs, and partially suspends, stop digestions of the system. An emotion of shame flushes the face; fear blanches it; joy illuminates it; and an instant thrill electrifies a million of nerves. Delirium infuses great energy Volition commands, and hundreds of muscles spring to execute. Powerful emotion often kills the body at a stroke, Chilo, Diagorus, and Sophocless, died of joy at the Grecian Games. The news of a defeat killed Philip the V. The doorkeeper of Congress expired upon hearing of the surrender of Cornwallis. Eminent public speakers have often died in the midst of an impassioned burst of eloquence, or when the deep emotion that produced it suddenly subsided. Largrave, the young Parisian, died when he heard that the musical prize for which he had competed was adjudged to another.

INDIAN MEAL WAFFLES.—Boil two cups of hominy very soft, add an equal quantity of sifted Indian meal, a table-spoonful of salt, half a teacup of butter, and three eggs, with milk enough to make a thin batter. Beat all together, and bake in waffle irons. When eggs cannot be procured, yeast is a good substitue—put a spoonful in the batter, and let it stand an hour to rise.

Copy of Notice published in the "London Gazette" of Friday, November 10. 1854.

Admiralty, Nov: 9. 1854.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty hereby give notice that they, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen, assert a continuing right to Her Majesty's Ships "Assistance" "Resolute" "Investigator," "Pioneer," and "Intrepid," which have been left in the Arctic Seas by their late crews.

THE FOLLOWING "ACTS" WERE PASSED DURING THE LAST SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE.

An Act chartering the City of Monrovia.

Whereas the citizens of Monrovia, in the county of Montserrado, have petitioned the Legislature to constitute them a "Body Politic" and "Corporate," by ratifying and granting a Charter, by them drawn up and herewith presented: therefore:

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled:—

Sec: 1. That the inhabitants of the city of Monrovia be, and they are hereby, constituted a Body Politic and Corporate under the name and style of Mayor, Aldermen, Common Council men and Freemen of Monrovia, and by such name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, and do all other acts that are usually done by such corporate bodies.

2. The Common Council shall consist of nine members residents of the city of Monrovia, of whom one shall be chairman.

3. The city of Monrovia shall have jurisdiction within the Corporate Bounds of the said city—the corporate bounds shall be three miles square—and in case it should be necessary to execute lawful process without the bounds of said corporation, then and in that case, any magistrate residing within said County may issue judicial process on representation of any city officer being made to him and the same may be executed by any constable of the County.

4. The Corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to make and fulfill contracts, take and hold real and personal estate to the value of one hundred thousand dollars, and levy all such taxes as may be necessary for city purposes; shall pass all necessary municipal laws and ordinances;— the Body Politic shall have full power to settle its own rules of proceeding; to appoint its own officers; regulate its own fees, and all other necessary acts not incompatible with the general laws of this Republic.

5. All ordinances and municipal laws established by the Common Council shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of the Mayor; if disapproved, his objection shall be made to the Common Council, within three days, and if not returned within three days such delay shall be equal to approval, provided, however, such delay be not occasioned by the adjournment of the Common Council. The Common Council may, nevertheless, by a vote of two thirds of its members, pass any law independent of the Mayor's approval.

6. The first election of city officers shall take place on the first Monday in April 1855. All other elections shall take place on the second Monday in January in each year, (except the Mayor, who shall be elected biennially,) and shall be conducted according to the laws governing elections for state officers, under such modifications and restrictions as the Common Council may ordain. The elective officers shall be one Mayor; four Aldermen, and nine Common Council men, all of whom shall hold their office for the term of one year: except the Mayor, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, unless vacated by resignation, removal or death; vacancies may be supplied by special elections. No person shall be eligible to the office of Mayor, who is not a resident of the city of Monrovia, and who does not possess unencumbered real estate to the value of three hundred dollars. No person shall be a Common Councilman who is not a resident of said city, and who does not possess unencumbered real estate to the value of one hundred dollars. No person who does not possess real estate in the city of Monrovia shall be allowed to vote.

7. There shall be a city Court, which shall be composed of three Aldermen; one of whom shall be chairman, whose duty it shall be to try and determine all cases coming into the same, except such as may be taken therefrom by appeals, as is hereinafter provided for. The Aldermen shall, within the precincts of the city exercise the functions of a justice of the peace, whose duty it shall be to try and determine all petty offences, and appeals may be had from their decision to the city Court, and from which appeals may also, be had to the County Court. The said city Court shall, by its own clerk, keep detailed records of all matters and things which shall come before it, in a book, or books, provided for that purpose, which, when full, shall be delivered to the Secretary of State, for preservation among the archives of this Republic.

8. The Common Council shall hold its first session on the first Monday in April. All impeachments of officers shall be made to the Mayor, who may, if said impeachments be sufficiently grounded, suspend such officer or officers, until the next ensuing session of the Council, which shall try all such impeachments.

9. The Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council shall have power to lay out new streets, highways and public walks or parks, and shall have power to appoint inspectors of all kinds of produce brought into, or exported from the city, together with inspectors of weights and measures.

10. The Mayor of said city shall be chief Executive Magistrate thereof, and it shall be his duty to be vigilant and active in causing the laws thereof to be executed and enforced, and he shall be conservator of the peace within said city; he shall recommend to the City Council at its regular session all such measures as in his opinion would enhance the condition of the streets, avenues, highways and public walks of the same, as well as to point out all nuisances of whatever kind, and recommend measures for their removal. He may, when actually necessary, for the preservation of the public peace, or for the suppression of mobs, riots, civil commotions or insurrectionists of whatever nature, order out the Militia which shall, by force of arms, compel said insurrectionists to obedience, the Mayor alone being responsible for the acts of the power.

11. If this Charter or any of its provisions shall be found inexpedient or inadequate in any respect the same may be revised, altered or supplemented, and amendments may be made by said city to the city, by petition to the Legislature of Liberia.

12. The Charter and all its provisions shall go into effect on the first Monday in March 1855. Any law or Charter to the contrary be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Approved Jan: 27th 1855

An Act authorizing the appointment of Surveyors for each County and defining their duties.

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.

Sec: 1. That immediately after the passage of this Act. There shall be appointed in each of the Counties of this Republic, Surveyors of Public lands for their respective Counties as follows: For Monsterrado County there shall be three Surveyors appointed for Grand Bassa County, there shall be two appointed and for Sinoe County there shall be two appointed, one being responsible for his own acts and duties disputes arising between two Surveyors as to the correctness of the survey of any plot or plots of land surveyed separately by them, the question shall be determined by the report of two Surveyors agreeing—but in case they do not three Surveyors shall be associated to determine the same

Sec: 2. It shall be the duty of the Surveyors severally or jointly when called upon in their respective Counties to survey Public lands drawn by emigrants or others in the city may be apportioned, by the order of the President or who soever he may appoint to issue such orders in the several Counties of this Republic. The lands to be sold at public auction to be surveyed at the order of the Land Commissioner.

Sec: 3. All lands shall be surveyed so as to give its situation, the number of lot or parcel of land as it may be, the boundaries, the four corners or angles and the number of acres. The Surveyor shall give to the party concerned in the survey a certificate describing the situation, the number, the boundaries the corners and quantity and receive from the said party, a receipt endorsed by the Commissioner of public lands stating that to their knowledge or belief as the case may be, said lot or parcel of land describing the same had been surveyed and a certificate of the same received, upon said receipt the Surveyor shall be entitled to pay for his services at rates as follows, For each ten acre plot surveyed at any one time to order not exceeding five plots Three dollars. For each ten acre plot surveyed in like manner not exceeding ten not less than six plots Two dollars and fifty cents. For each ten acre plot not exceeding twenty not less than eleven plots Two dollars and twenty five cents. For every ten acre plot over twenty plots Two dollars, and for every Town Lot surveyed one dollar. It shall be the duty of the Surveyor to report to the Land Commissioners of all public lands surveyed by him, to the order of the President for emigrants or others, giving their situation boundaries &c and to extend on the Plot deposited in the Land Commissioners office, as additional surveys are made, and shall receive from the government twelve and a half cents for each ten acre block up to four, at any one time extended on the plot, and five and upwards at any one time ten cents per block, and for Town lots six and a quarter cents up to four, and five and upwards extended at any one time, five cents each. The said Land Commissioner shall examine said plots by comparing them with the field notes, and if found correct shall endorse the receipt for survey, certifying on the same that the block had been ploted, on which the Surveyor shall receive his pay.

Sect: 4. Any Surveyor or Surveyors fraudulently obtaining a receipt from any party on a false certificate when the lands as stated in the certificate, had not been surveyed according to law, upon conviction of the same before any Court having jurisdiction in the case, he shall be fined in a sum of not less than Fifty dollars nor more than One Houndred dollars and dismissed from Office.

Sect: 5. That any law conflicting with this act be and the same is hereby repealed.

Approved Jany 30th 1855.

An Act Encouraging Agriculture.

Whereas it is important that the Government take an active part in encouraging National Industry; and whereas the wants of our agricultural interests imperatively demand assistance in the manufacture of the products of the country and preparing it for market; and whereas the time has arrived, as is found in the wants of the country and the condition of our finances: therefore, for the encouragement of agriculturalists and laborers thoughout the Republic:—

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.

Sec: 1. That, from and after the passage of this act, he President is hereby authorized and requested to have imported into the Republic, on application, of any number of citizens of this Republic, for asses to carry on farming operations, &c. they giving orders, with accepted obligations, for said animals to be imported at their expense; said expense not to exceed the cost and charges of such purchase and importation, a number of asses as may be so ordered, from time to time, until said orders are complete. Also, one steam Mill of four horse power, and six three roller horizontal sugar mills, to be propelled by physical or animal force: and further, to import any other animals that may appear to meet the wants of the people, provided it does not exceed one hundred of each, of the best breed that can be procured.

Sec: 2. It is further enacted—That each mill shall have its full number of kettles, not to exceed seven to each mill, with every fixture and utensil that are used in the manufactory of sugar in other countries—or that may be found necessary to facilitate the manufactory of sugar and syrup.

Sec: 3. That the President be and he is hereby authorized and requested to procure the above named animals and machinery on the faith and credit of the Republic, if necessary, to be paid in two instalments, and at an interest not to exceed ten percentum.

Sec: 4. To carry out this act, The President is authorized to appoint some suitable person, a citizen of the Republic, if he find it necessary, to proceed to Europe, or the United States, or any of the lands, and procure at the most reasonable rates, the above named machines and animals.—And, further, the said person shall recieve for compensation an amount not to exceed five hundred dollars and expenses.

Sec: 5.—It is further enacted:—That so soon as the machines shall arrive; the Steam Sugar Mill and four of the three roller horizontal mills, shall be located on the St. Paul's river, at the most advantageous situations, so as to meet the circumstances of the people, the mills are to be set up with their fixtures, at the expense of the Government. A suitable person shall be appointed to take charge of the steam Sugar Mill, and to superintend it in its operations. All persons wishing to manufacture cane shall deliver it at the mill. It shall be the duty of the superintendent to receive all cane so delivered, and proceed to manufacture it into sugar or syrup, as the person may wish. He shall weigh the sugar and measure the syrup, and deliver the same to the owners, deducting one sixth per centum for tolls. He shall have power to employ a sufficient number of hands to attend the operations of the mill and the manufacture of the cane, and all and every expense shall be under his control. He shall keep an account of all expenses, and all sugar or syrup manufactured by him, and make a report each quarter to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall order the sale of the product collected for toll and receive the monies to be paid into the Treasury. The Superindent shall give bond and security for the faithful performance of his duties. The Superintendent shall receive a compensation not to exceed Thirty dollars per month.

Sec: 6. It is further enacted.—That one of the three horizintal mills shall be located in Grand Bassa County, and one in Sinoe County, which mill shall be set up with their fixtures, at the expense of the Government.—They may be placed under the care of some judicious person, who shall collect one twelfth per centum toll, and pay it over as provided in the 5th Sec: and see that the mills are worked carefully etc. etc. and kept clean and in order. The provisions of this section shall apply also, to the Horrizontal Mills in Montserrado County.

Approved Dec. 26th 1854.

An Act authorizing the settling of Land difficulties in the settlement of Caldwell, and survey of lands in all the settlements of the Republic where difficulties exist.

Whereas there exists in the settlement of Caldwell or that portion of the settlement which is laid off into a Town ship considerable dissatisfaction amongst the settlers arising from an arrangement entered into in the year 1852 between the Agent of the American Colonization Society and the settlers of that place for the surrender of certain farm lands which were owned by the said settlers so as to have that portion of the said settlement laid off into a Township with the understanding that the parties to whom said farm lands belonged should receive in lieu thereof one alternate lot into which said farm land was divided and also receive the same complement of farm land as surrendered at some other point where they might select; which arrangement on the part of the Agent of the American Colonization Society in every respect was not complied with, many of the settlers did not receive their farm land and the lands as laid off into Town lots have been apportioned to emigrants arriving and settling at Caldwell since the arrangement was entered into which lands have been improved and deeded to the parties under the regulations of the American Colonization Society in relation to the distribution of lands to emigrants and at the same time there have been no transfer made of said lands by the former owners, and some of them or their heirs now hold original deeds for a portion of said lands (now Town lots) upon demand and a compliance with said agreement that they may come into possession of their farm lands, otherwise they must contend for their legal right under the deed which they hold, and which would greatly to the disadvantage and damage of parties now holding said lands under deeds from the Societies Agent.

And Whereas the citizens of Caldwell have petitioned the Legislature to authorize such steps as they may deem prudent, to cause an amicable adjustment of the matter and to give to the parties concerned their just dues as per arrangement before mentioned, that the parties now in possession of said lands may continue to hold possession unmolested.

It it Therefore Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic Liberia in Legislature Assembled.

Sect: 1 That from and after the passage of this Resolution that the President be, and he is hereby authorized and requested to appoint two discreet persons as Commissioners whose duty it shall be at as early a date as possible to repair to Caldwell for the purpose of hearing and investigating all claims presented by the different parties for lands under the arrangement entered into in the year 1832 by the Agent of the American Colonization Society.

Sect: 2. And further—That they shall be authorized to swear witnesses, hear their statements and received any documentary evidence touching the claims and fairly and impartially investigate all such claims, giving their decision as to their opinion of the legality or illegality of the claims so investigated and give to the parties concerned in writing their decision or opinion; in all such cases where the parties are not satisfied with the decision of the Commissioners, they have further redress at the regular Court's of law.

Sect: 3. And further—The Commissioners shall publish in the several Townships of Montserrado County at least fifteen days previous to the days on which they will commence their investigation giving notice that they will be ready to receive all claims for lands under arrangements as heretofore setforth, naming the day and date on which the investigation will commence giving all particulars, that parties may be fully prepared with evidence &c.

Sect: 4. And further—That the Commissioners shall keep in a book furnished for the purpose, minutes of all their proceeding and their decision on each claim investigated, and shall report to the President all their proceedings with the claims setforth and their decision. The President on receiving the report of said Commissioners, is hereby authorized and requested to apportion to such person or persons whose claims according to the decision of the Commissioners are legal the quantity or quantities of lands as their claims may call for, and at such points as may be selected by them excepting reserved lands. The said Commissioners shall receive for their services to be paid by the government the sum of Three dollars per day, while in actual service, and mileage according to law.

Sect: 5. And further—That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and requested (at as early a date as possible) to have surveyed all of that portion of the settlement of Caldwell which was laid off into a Township, and have a correct plot taken of the same if there is none, giving the name of the owner or owners of each lot, and their number, and to ascertain the number of lots remaining, belonging to the government, that the same may be apportioned to emigrants; or otherwise disposed of an application according to law.

Sect: 6. And further—As the citizens of Caldwell are willing to render every assistance to the Surveyor who may be appointed to survey said Township of Caldwell. That the Surveyor receive for the survey and ploting of the Township of Caldwell the sum of Seventy five dollars to be paid by the government, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sect: 7. And further—That the President appoint two discreet persons of the aforesaid Settlement whose duty it shall be to superintend the survey, so as to be calculated to sign the required certificate for the correctness of the survey according to law.

Sect: 8. And further—That the President be and is hereby authorized and requested on application of any person or persons holding a deed or deeds for lands drawn or purchased from the government in any of the settlements or villages of this Republic said difficulties to be settled at expense of the government, supposed to bear a wrong number or giving a wrong course or situation. To make such arrangements for the investigation of the same, as he may deem advisable for to correct said error if any and on being satisfied that an error or errors exist in said deed or deeds to correct the same, by altering the deed or deeds, or apportioning land to the person or persons concerned, at some other point.

Approved Jany 28th 1855

An Act for the relief and employment of the Poor.

Sec 1 It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled:—

That the support and maintenance of aged widows, destitute orphans, poor persons and invalid poor, and all insane persons destitute of support, shall be borne by the Republic, under the following provisions.

2. It is further enacted:—That manual and mechanic labor asylums shall be provided for such classes of individuals as are named (whether colonists or natives;) in the first section, in each of the counties of this Republic, to be styled County Poor Houses. Each house shall be forty feet by thirty feet: two stories high, of nine feet each, with passages running through the centre: and two rooms in the Attic; so partitioned, as to make four rooms on each of the floors of the two stories; with a piazza in front of the building. The walls to be of brick, or stone, or good durable wood material. And that a Superintendent be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose business it shall be to superintend and manage the operative concerns of the said institution.

3. It is further enacted:—That all male inmates of the said County Poor Houses, not disabled by disease or otherwise, shall be employed in the cultivation of a farm, which shall be connected with the establishment: or any other kind of labor that may be instituted about the premises, until the overseer and commissioners shall judge them capable of taking care of themselves; and all articles used by the inmates of said establishment, from the farm, shall be accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the proceeds arising from the sale of any surplus shall be paid into the public Treasury. The President shall appoint a discreet person to choose any tract of land not otherwise appropriated, which may be used for the establishment; not, however to exceed one hundred acres.

4. It is further enacted:—That a number of cards, wheels, looms, knitting and sewing needles, shall be provided for the use of all females who reside in the County Poor House, so that they may be employed in carding, spining, weaving, knitting and sewing: and, to the end that there be no idlers about the institution, the requisite quantum of wool, cotton, flax, hemp, and such other materials as may be manufactured into useful articles for the convenience of the country, shall be kept constantly on hand.

5. It is further enacted:—That there shall be a matron employed, whose duty it shall be to take care of the children, and see that cleanliness is strictly observed, under such rules as the board of commissioners may from time to time point out to her. And she shall receive a compensation for her services, to be fixed by the said commissioners.

6. It is further enacted:—That, for the improvement of the inmates of this institution, carpenters, rope-makers, blacksmiths and such other mechanic arts as the improving state of the institution may demand, may be employed in and about the establishment, for the purpose of instructing the inmates in these several branches.

7 It is further enacted:—That the poor of this Republic shall not be allowed to wander about from one settlement to the other, but shall be taken by the officer appointed for that purpose, and placed under the care of the Superintendent of the County Poor House—the Government paying out of the monies appropriated for this purpose, the expenses of such removals to the Poor House.

8 It is further enacted.—That a board of seventeen commissioners shall be appointed annually by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, seven for the County of Montserrado; five for the county of Grand Bassa, and five for the County of Sinoe. This board shall regularly inspect, once in every three months, these institutions, and make annual reports to the Legislature, of the condition of the health of the inmates, and their improvement in morals, education, and mechanic arts—whether they are properly fed and clothed—what the state of discipline the receipts and expenditures of the County Poor House, and suggest any plan of improvement, they may deem expedient.

The Board shall include, also, in their reports, the number of paupers, invalids, aged widows, destitute orphans and insane persons in their respective Counties. It shall be the duty of said Commissioners to prescribe the rates of allowance for the support of the inmates of said institution, and to ordain such rules and regulations for the government of the establishment, not otherwise provided by law.

9. And it is further enacted:—That there shall be kept a record of the names of the inmates of each County Poor House, by the Superintendent—which record shall be handed to the Commissioners, in time to be included in their annual reports to the President.

10. It is further enacted:—That so much of the duties as arises from the importation of all ardent spirits, wines and cordials, in this Republic, be, and the same is hereby appropriated to carry out the provisions of this act, and the President is hereby authorized to draw on the public Treasury for the same, and as soon as a sufficient amount of monies from said duties is collected to justify the commencement of said Poor Houses, he is hereby requested to commence the erection of said buildings,

11. It is further enacted:—That, as an explanation, so much of this act as refers to the employment of mechanics, carpenters, ropemakers, blacksmiths, &c and the procuring of cards, wheels, looms, &c, and the "requisite quantum" of wool, cotton, flax, hemp, &c, be, and the same is left to the judgement of the President, as to whether he should provide them, until after the above buildings for the poor are erected, or not: and then only such of the above named mechanics and materials &c, as he may deem expedient, for the useful and necessary operations of said Poor Houses, and as the money arising from said duties may justify.

Approved Jany 30th 1855

An Act authorizing and directing the formation of a Settlement at Grand Cape Mount in the County of Monsterrado.

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.

Sect 1. That the President be and he is hereby authorized and requested, to adopt such measures as may be deemed most advisable, to carry out the provisions of this act by securing the services of seventy five volunteers (able bodied men) to proceed to Grand Cape Mount, in the service of the government, said volunteers to be fed by the government, and to be governed by the appended rules, and such other rules, and regulations as the President may deem necessary for the establishment and security of a Settlement. Rations of said volunteers, shall be in quality and quantity the same granted to the Militia when in actual service. The services to be rendered by said volunteers, shall be regulated by the President, or by such officer or officers, acting under his instructions as he may appoint to perform such duty.

Sect 2. That the volunteers shall enlist to serve twelve months, they shall be paid for service rendered at the rate of Eight dollars per month, and as an inducement to settle permanently at Cape Mount. (The President is requested to procure such volunteers, as wish to settle permanently at Grand Cape Mount if possible) each volunteer shall receive as a bounty, one Town lot, and Thirty acres of farm land.

Sect 3. That the President is further authorized, if circumstances will warrant it, to proceed to Cape Mount at an early day, for the purpose of selecting a suitable site, and direct the laying out of a Town, to be called "Roberts

Port," as a token of respect for the many valuable services rendered by the illustrious Chief Magistrate of this Republic. The lots in said Town shal be one quarter of an acre of land, and adjacent there shall be Farm lots laid out of Ten acres each, and the plan of the Town, width of the streets, the number and size of the public parks (if any) shall be left to the discretion of the Executive, whose name it is intended to bear, and in case that circumstances will not warrant the President's proceeding to Cape Mount, he is authorized to appoint some judicious person or persons, to superintend the same.

Sect 4. The President is hereby instructed and authorized, to elect and appoint such officers for said settlement, as he may deem necessary, and shall fix the pay of the acting officers, and shall take any, and all necessary measures for the defence and protection of the place, by having erected a Stockade or Block house, as may be found requisite, or if at all needed for common defence, and as the extension of settlements along our coast, when practicable is desirable, and in this case, also the securing of peace to the Country. The President is requested, in person or by commissioners, to use any and every conciliatory effort possible, to secure this desirable end.

Sect 5. It is further Enacted,—That the sum of Four thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Public Treasury, to carry out the provisions of this Act, and that the President be and he is hereby authorized to draw on the Public Treasury for the same.

Rules and Regulations for the Settlement of Grand Cape Mount.

The Government being about to found and build up a settlement at Grand Cape Mount, the following regulations shall be in force until otherwise ordered. The rules shall be read or otherwise made known to every person to become a volunteer, and his consent to be governed by them, obtained before his name be registered as a volunteer.

1st. The settlement shall be governed by such ordinances as the President shall from time to time ordain, and to which every settler or volunteer shall be required to conform.

2nd. There shall be an Intendant of the settlement—three Magistrates and two Constables. The duties of the first, and his remuneration and immunities, if any, to be fixed by the President until the meeting of the Legislature.

3rd. Each volunteer shall engage to remain at the settlement Twelve Months: an abandonment of the settlement before the expiration of that time, shall operate to the forfeiture of all claims for bounty of every description.

4th. Each volunteer shall faithfully and promptly obey all such laws, as may be, from time to time made, whether by the President, Legislature, or Committee of Vigilance, for the government of the settlement—and all regulations which may be made by the said committee for temporary and local purposes shall have the force of law until repealed or revoked.

5th The President may at pleasure revoke any law made by the committee of vigilance.

6th. The Intendant of the settlement shall name three persons from among the volunteers, who with himself and the Magistrates shall constitute a committee of vigilance:—five of whom shall be competent to act. Their duties shall be to direct and to determine such duties of protection, defense, or police, as may not be specifically assigned to the Intendant by the President or Legislature, and which may be deemed necessary to the safety and prosperity of the settlement.

7th. At the expiration of Twelve Months each volunteer shall be entitled to a deed in fee simple for one town lot and acres of farm land: provided the claim therefor shall not have been forfeited. The legal representatives of any volunteer who shall have gone to the settlement, but died before the expiration of twelve months, shall be entitled to his land, and the title shall vest in said representative in the same manner as it would have vested in the volunteer, had he survived the twelve months.

8th. Each volunteer during the first three months, shall, in addition to the regular military and police duty, which may be enjoined by the Superintendent or Committee of Vigilance, give two days service gratis, in clearing lands, erecting defences, cutting lines for surveys &c.

9th. When a site for a town shall have been selected, and a plot for the same made out, the volunteers shall be entitled to draw lots, and a certificate shall be given to each one so drawing, and his name marked on the corseponding number in the plot and registered in a register to be kept by the Superintendent for the purpose. The same rule shall hold in the allotment of farm lands; subject however in every case to such reservations as may be made for governmental purposes.

10th. The word volunteers are meant to apply exclusively to such persons as shall or may be selected to go up and form the settlement.

11th. The President or Legislature may make from time to time any other regulations not repugnant to the above.

12. The volunteers shall constitute one military company, under the command of one Captain, two Lieutenants, one Ensign, four Sergeants and four Corporals, the Captain, Lieutenants, and Ensign, shall be named and commissioned by the President, the others to be elected by the company. It is understood that this company is a temporary institution to be disbanded at the pleasure of the President. The company is to drill twice a day if necessary, and shall do such duty, day and night as sentinel and guard as the exigency of the case may require.

13th. The regulations in regard to military duty shall bear equally upon all persons whether volunteers or not, who shall reside in the settlement: Provided there shall no foreigners be included in the above arrangement.

14. The commissioned officers of the company, or a majority of them, shall compose a board and be competent to try all offences which do not involve the life of the offenders, and shall have the same authority to inflict punishment and impose fines that is granted by law to a Regimental court martial.

15th. Each volunteer shall be held responsible for all public property which may be placed in his charge.

Whereas His Excellency the President sets forth in his message to the Legislature, the further continuance of that lively interest manifested by Saml Gurney Esqr of London, for the welfare and prosperity of the Republic of Liberia, by considering her wants, and his liberality in aiding by his influence, and means to have them supplied, and of his cordial co-operation in a measure proposed by himself in procuring for the Republic of Liberia a metallic Currency, which he thought Liberia ought to have, and which he readily proposed to furnish, which would cost about Two Hundred pounds, on condition that the government of Liberia would supply one Hundred pounds, and that he would supply one Hundred pounds to meet the demand, which proposition was agreed to by His Excellency the President assuming the responsibility on the part of the government.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.—

Sec: 1. That the responsibility assumed by His Excellency the President in accepting the proposition of Saml: Gurney Esqr of London, and his agreeing on the part of the Republic, to furnish one Hundred pounds, for furnishing the Republic of Liberia with a metallic Currency, meets the most favorable concurrence of the Legislature; and further: do hereby appropriate the sum of Six Hundred dollars, to meet the aforesaid amount, and any other charges arising, and the President be and he is hereby authorized to draw on the Public Treasury for the same,

Sec: 2. And it is further Resolved that the President be and he is hereby requested, to tender Saml: Gurney Esqr: of London, the thanks of this government, and the citizens generally for the liberal contribution made by him in aid, for the procuring of a metallic Currency for the Republic of Liberia, and that they gratefully acknowledge the same.

Approved January 25th 1855.

An Act to Regulate the Sale of Public Lands &c.

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.—

Sect. 1. That there shall be appointed in each of the Counties of this Republic, one person to be called Land Commissioner, his duty shall be to effect the sale of public lands, any citizen expressing to him a desire to purchase a lot or parcel of public land (excepting such as may be reserved for public use) he shall forthwith have the said lot or parcel of land so desired, surveyed at the expense of the government, so as to give the precise number, situation and the boundaries before offering it for sale, and upon his receiving the Surveyor's certificate describing the boundaries, number &c. of said land, he shall on the first day of the term of the Court of Quarter session, when it is not in session offer at public auction in front of the "Court House" the lot or parcel of land so desired and surveyed. He shall file in his office all certificates received by him from the Surveyor of lands surveyed by him, and keep a correct account in a book furnished for the purpose of all lands sold, and report quarterly to the Secretary of the Treasury. And shall receive five per cent to be paid by the government on all sales of land effected by him.

2. It is further Enacted:—That the Land Commissioner shall give the purchaser of lands sold by him a copy of the Surveyor's certificate, endorsed on the back of it the date on which the land was sold, and the amount for which it was sold. The purchaser on receiving said certificate shall pay into the Treasury, within ninety days the full amount for land so purchased, and take the Treasurers receipt for the same, and present the same to the Land Commissioner, and should the purchaser fail to comply the sale shall be null and void and in all such cases the person shall be responsible to the Land Commissioner for the amount of his percentage on sales, and on his failing to pay the same, it may be recovered in an action of debt before any Justice of the Peace or Court having jurisdiction in the case.

3. It is further Enacted:—That the Land Commissioner on receiving the Treasurers receipt for monies paid in for lands sold, shall forthwith grant the purchaser a certificate addressed to the Register certifying that he had complied with the law in the purchase of lot or parcel of land as described by the Surveyors certificate a copy of the same thereto annexed and that he is entitled to a deed for the same, for which certificate he shall pay twenty five cents. All lands surveyed and offered at auction and not sold may be sold by the Land Commissioner at private sale, payment to be made the same as land sold at auction. No lots to be sold below the minimum prices named. The minimum prices of land lying on the navigable rivers shall be one dollar an acre, and that lying in the interior of the Land on the rivers Fifty cents. Town lots each shall be. That land except marshy, rocky and [illegible] piece of land which may be sold to the highest bidder.

4. It is further Enacted:—That it shall be the duty of the Register on receiving the certificate of the Land Commission with a copy of the Surveyor's certificate describing the number and boundaries &c, of land annexed. To immediately fill up a deed with the number of acres, number of lot and boundaries &c as per Surveyor's certificate, countersigning the same as being executed on the authority of the Land Commissioner's certificate with the day and date so executed and deliver the same over to the purchaser, he paying for the same. The Register shall file all certificates and shall transmit them semi-annually to the Secretary of State. He shall be allowed the usual fee for making out and recording deeds, it being hereby made the duty of each Register when called upon to record deeds for lands sold in his County, in a book furnished him for the purpose. The President is hereby authorized and requested to lodge in the hands of the Register of each County a sufficient number of blank deeds for lands, to be filled up by the Register according to the 4th, Section of the act.

5. It is further Enacted:—That the President is hereby authorized and requested to have drawn up at as early a date as possible so as be extended a correct plot, where there is none of each Town and Village or Settlement in the several Counties of this Republic, where lands are being drawn or sold and a copy of each plot of the different Towns, Villages or Settlements in the respective Counties, be placed in the office of the Land Commissioner, and also in the office of the Register to note on the plot deposited in his office, all lands disposed of by the government for which he gave deeds, or otherwise coming under his notice, and to whom conveyed. It shall be the duty of the duty of the Land Commissioner to note on the plot deposited in his office all lands sold by him stating to whom sold, and of all lands reported by the Surveyors. The Land Commissioner shall be held responsible for any damage sustained by any person or persons from mis-management or neglect of the duties of his office. And further any law conflicting with this act, be and the same is hereby repealed.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, FEBRUARY 7, 1855.

THE LEGISLATURE after an unusually protracted session, adjourned sine die on the 31st ult. We publish in our present number as many of the new laws as our space will allow. We hope that our fellow citizens will feel sufficient interest in them to give them a careful perusal; and so to familiarize themselves with them as never to be under the shameful necessity of confessing ignorance of their existence. The rest will appear in our next.

EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

THE WAR in the East is assuming a very serious and formidable aspect. The Crimea is made the scene of the most sanguinary conflicts, and the grave of thousands of the most hardy of the allied troops.

THE LATEST—Our readers are no doubt aware that the Allies have been for some time besieging Sebastopol. Failing to impress them that power ful fortress by assault, without great carnage and sacrifice of life, they are testing what virtue there is in famine. The British are encamped on the south east side of Sebastopol, South of Balaklava Bay; the French on the South West, South of Karabelnaya Bay.

SABBATH DESECRATION.—Early on Sunday morning last, while the Christians were [illegible] and that Divine right is on their side, and [illegible] made their soldiers think the Sabbath is propitious,—made a desperate sortie from Sebastopol and assaulted the British portion of the besiegers. The English together unprepared for so sudden an attack, the English sustained it nobly; and with their comparatively small force [illegible] not less than 50,000 men with sixty heavy field pieces, until about half past nine O'clock in the morning, when the French came up to their assistance. After two hours' hard contest the Russians were repulsed and the battle field remained in possession of the Allies. It presented a dreadful spectacle. Upwards of 3000 Russians lay dead in various places. The Allies also suffered severe losses. Among the English upwards of 600 men [illegible] were wounded and missing.—The French lost about 700 killed and wounded.

While General Canrobert, Commander-in-chief of the French troops, was engaged in the battle of Inkermann, the Russians made a determined assault on the French lines opposite Sebastopol. They sallied with 40,000 men and attacked the sailors battery by the shore. They met with no success; but were driven back to the wall of the town with the loss of 1000 men and 100 prisoners. The loss of the French in this sortie [illegible] killed and wounded.

RUSSIANS MISSING—The London News says; A letter from Sebastopol states that when the muster roll of the Russian army at Sebastopol was called over on the 6th of November, the day after the battle of Inkermann no less than 10,000 were absent." The English and the French together took about 3000 prisoners.

FRENCH REINFORCEMENTS—ON the 7th of November a reinforcement of 5,000 French troops entered the Bay of Chersonese.

AUSTRIA IS NOW WITH THE WESTERN POWERS. The Illustrated London News says; A Treaty of Alliance offensive and defensive was signed at Vienna on the 2nd of December [1854,] by the Representatives of Great Britain, France, and Austria. The treaty commences by repeating and recording the declarations and the principal acts of the conference of Vienna, as well as the declarations and engagements contained in the notes exchanged on the 8th of August 1854, between the high contracting parties.

It maintains the four points of guarantee as the necessary basis of peace, at the same time that it reserves and recognises to each of the Powers the faculty of extending them by additional conditions.

Austria binds herself to France and England, as she had already done to Turkey, by the Treaty of the 14th of June 1854, to occupy the Principalities for the purpose of repulsing the Russian troops, if they attempted to re-enter them.

Austria proclaims the right as justly belonging to Turkey and to the Allies, of making all the movements which may suit them for the purpose of attacking, either the Russian troops or the Russian territory.

If, in consequence of her attitude in the Principalities, or for any other cause, Austria should find herself at war with Russia the alliance, offensive and defensive between her, France, and England, shall be established by the fact of the war.

If, before the end of the present year, 1854, Russia should not have made propositions which are considered acceptable, and which ensure good and durable peace, the three Powers will advise as to the means of obtaining that peace.

The three high contracting Powers bind themselves not to accept any proposition for the re-establishment of peace without having deliberated upon it in common.

PRUSSIA—It is stated that the new treaty between Austria and the Western Powers had been sent to Berlin, and that at a council held on the 6th of December by the king and his Ministers, the adhesion to the treaty was determined upon. This produced great surprise among the Russian party.

DENMARK—At a large meeting of Danes held in the city of London in November last, the following sentiments were expressed by one of the speakers;

"That the sympathy of the Danish people was with Allied forces doing such glorious deeds in the Crimea The struggle was that of civilization against barbarism; although that little country Denmark was not engaged there must not forget that her independence, her position as a nation depended upon this struggle. The Danes were akin to the English, and whatever the feelings of the Danish Ministry might be this he could say, that the [illegible] and free spoken Danes were with the people of England in this mighty struggle of liberty against despotism."

THE BALTIC FLEET arrived safely at Spithead England, on the 18th of December. Sir Charles Napier, Commander of the fleet, landed at Portsmouth on the next day, from a steam-yacht which had been sent to Spithead to bring him on shore; a number of people assembled to see Sir Charles on his return to England.

THE BLACK SEA—A severe storm prevailed on the Black Sea on the 29th of November during which several vessels of the allied fleet sustained severe injury. About forty French sailors including two officers having been cast ashore, and made prisoners by the Russians were left under the guard of a strong picket of Cossacks. In the middle of the night, while seated around a fire, the sailors, on a signal from the officer, arming themselves with burning sticks attacked their keepers, disarmed some, put the others to flight and escaped to the coast where they embarked in boats sent by the vessels that were able to weather the storm.

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE.

By the American barque "Shirley" Capt: G. W. S. Hall, which arrived on the 30th ult: we have news to the 8th of December. Congress was in session—On the 4th of Dec: both Houses assembled at noon,—37 Senators and 197 Representatives being present. We have given President Pierce's Message a cursory perusal. He begins by noticing as is usual, the occurrences of the past year. Great losses sustained in various parts of the country by agriculturists, the prevalence of pestilence—the numerous catastrophies by sea and land; but rejoices in the fact that notwithstanding all, the United States have experienced a year of peace, health has been regained, and the harvest has generally been plentiful. He then goes on to the domestic and foreign relations, of the United States, defines their position with reference to the European war &c &c The revenue of the Government and the expenditures by several millions of dollars. After various suggestions for the improvement of affairs the message is concluded with eulogistic expressions in relation to the position and prospects of the "Great Republic" the most prosperous nation on the face of the Globe. Liberia was of course too insignificant to find a place in that important document; we are not of the proper "mould."—

When we take some things into consideration, however, we question whether it is not all for the best that that Government still holds itself at so great a distant from us.

The decision recently made by the Supreme Court of the State of California, upon the admissibility of Chinese testimony in the courts of that State has astonished us more than anything we have heard lately. The Baltimore American of Dec 2, says: "A white citizen of California was indicted for murder and convicted on the testimony of Chinese witnesses. He appealed on the ground that by the State law regulating criminal proceedings, "no black or mulatto person, or Indian shall be allowed to give evidence in favor of or against a white man," The question investigated by the court was, whether under either of these descriptions, and if any, under which natives of China must be classed to make them incompetent to give testimony in criminal cases against whites. The opinion of the court, delivered by Chief Justice Murray, was that Chinese, are not competent to give testimony against whites, in the courts of California, and accordingly the verdict in the case was set aside." If we mistake not there is a treaty of amity and commerce existing between the Chinese Government, and the Government of the United States, and yet one of the States has the right to subject citizens of China to such degrading treatment. What a country! This is the glorious Union of which its citizens so much boast. This is the country whose citizens frequently indulge in such high self laudations, styling themselves "the freest people in the world," and their country "the asylum for the oppressed and down trodden of mankind," &c. Surely the most disgusting of all despotisms is that which mocks freedom and liberal principles,—and which under the cloak of Republicanism practises cruel oppressions upon the weak and helpless.

OF A TOUR INTO THE COUNTRY, INTERIOR OF GRAND BASSA,

BY GEORGE L. SEYMOUR.

Bexley May 23rd 1855.

Mr Herald—

Sir—I submit for insertion in your paper the following Journal of a short tour, that I made, a few days ago, about one hundred and fifty miles interior of this place; that you and your readers may see that we are not indifferent to the welfare of the natives in this part of Africa; as also the interest of the Government in general. as you will discover that I took some notice of such things as may interest the Republic in the future, though now, they may have an appearance of insignificance to some.

April 30th Left Bexley about 5 o'clock A. M. the weather was very fine, though from the heavy dews that had fallen the night previous, and from the recent rains the ground was rather damp. It being so early in the morning it was of course dark, when we first startled; but the sun soon arose. rejoicing in his strength, and dispelled the thick mists in which we were enveloped; sending his brilliant rays through the top of the dense forest, and enlivening the scenery around.

We passed to Bargah's town in a walk of about two hours and a half and informed the people of the object of our journey, (which was to see the Pessey tribe and collect such information from them as would guide me or others in the business and work of preaching the gospel among them,—for which I feel peculiarly drawn out towards this tribe.) We traveled on to Rock Town commonly called Sodwah's where we arrived about half past ten o'clock A. M. and found the people in readiness for a hostile attack from us, as, having been misled by false reports, they supposed that I was coming with an army to fight them; and it was quite amusing to see them sneek and dodge about, even after the real cause of our visit had been made known. I informed them that the Liberians never carried war except they find that letters and documents will not effect a satisfactory settlement of difficulties and hostilities; then they find it necessary to burn a little brimstone and salt petre. I inquired whether they wished their children instructed, they answered in the affirmative with a promise to aid in the erection of a school house, and all appeared glad to hear that steps were to be taken for this;—and here I beg leave to remark, that, I had here, a striking illustration of the remarks of our Savior. "The harvest truly is plenteous; but the laborers are few." I feel deeply for the aboriginal inhabitants of the Republic in view of their destitute condition; for I consider that they are neglected to a criminal degree, by the Church of Christ though militant and aggressive in its character—in Liberia, and their real condition being only vaguely known in other parts of the world, they are thus slighted Bogee the head man of Sodwah informed me that his people were willing to do the will of God but that it was impossible for them to know it unless some one would teach them: that they had had promises before of teachers and preachers; but none had even come to instruct them. You may be assured that I was affected by their relation of their wants and wishes; and I think the Church should not withhold her care any longer from the native inhabitants. I traveled on hence to Dunanga's place, and arrived there about 3 o'clock P. M. where, making the object of our journey known, we were hailed with gladness. The people were expecting an attack from some of Pago's people who charged one Borah with having poisoned Pago,—who had lately died. They were accordingly preparing for the anticipated invasion by making a barricade. We tarried all night at his place—which is presided over by one Beangah, who appears well disposed toward the Liberians; yet here, as elsewhere system is needed to render them a wealthy, and happy people; such are their circumstances that a little effort, would effect a great change for the better in their condition. Here the poor ignorant people suffering from the hands of the petty country merchant, instead of purchasing their goods from the Captain as other citizens do, they consent through the charm of credit to be the dupes of some of our indolent—Liberians who live at the expense of the happiness of the natives. I preached to the people of this town who were quite attentive; their number, however, was not very large. They said they were in a state darkness they were willing to reform if they but knew their duty to God; that they would be glad of a school for their children and hoped the time would come when some one would come to instruct them.

May 1st. Early in the morning had prayers with the people and prepared to take our departure, which we did about 9 o'clock. After giving the people the advice that if they try to do right God will certainly bless them, and that they need not fear war &c, we travelled through old farms and towns and stately forests, over hills and through dales across creeks and running brooks, until we arrived at Peter H. Herring's about one o'clock P. M; we were kindly entertained by Mr Herring who is a young native of Bassa, brought up by Rev Amos Herring of Monrovia; he reads and writes, ciphers &c the result of Rev Mr Herring's teaching; and is now well qualified to take charge of a school. I met at this place an old gentlemen, by the name of Cey, with some others to whom I made my intention known, and they appeared to rejoice at the object in view. Cey informed me that he would be glad of some one to preach the gospel to the people in general. Two interior paths meet at this place which render it a great place for trade. Having rested awhile here, we passed on to Cey's town where we were presented with a goat for our dinner, and were invited to tarry for the night; but it being about ½ past two o'clock, I thought it well to go as far as Noblah's town; therefore after giving Cey a small "dash" of cloth and to bacco, we travelled until about four o'clock when we arrived at Noblah's which is on the edge of the famous camwood country. The town contains about fifty houses, and is presided over by Noblah's son,—Noblah being dead. We concluded to put up for the night at this place; we were received with much kindness and attention; and after the usual salutations, we made our object known, which as usual, created gladness among the people. I preached to them at night; they were very attentive and confessed their ignorance, and ack nowledged their state of darkness and expressed a desire to be instructed in the ways of life.

Here, as I said, is the beginning of the camwood country, but it has been cut so frequently and cleared that very little can be procured at this place for commerce, yet if there were some system about rearing it up and making one hand of it which can be done very easily for the twig cut and stuck in the ground will readily grow; so that if any one would take the trouble immense quantities of camwood might be set out near the sea coast and in thirty or forty years from this period those engaged in the business might be able to supply foreign demands without going to the interior for it; It suppose much more could be done if it were not for the unpardonable indolence of some of our citizens of both classes. I did not go into the country camwood hunting, yet I shall relate all about it that I may deem interesting. I informed Blanyah that neither he nor his people should take trust from any one, but bring his produce to the beach and purchase his goods at first cost and then he would never be troubled about being in debt to others, and I felt that I was doing the will of God in thus informing him for the act is strictly in accordance with the command of Jesus Christ, "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye also unto them;" feeling a conviction that like the people of distant ages (before the reformation) who suffered under papal oppression, that the time has come for a revolution among the aboriginal inhabitants of the Christian Republic of Liberia, I feel disposed to stand the storm that may gather and burst upon my head by imparting to them a knowledge of their legal rights as men and will here ever be a judge myself and strive to do the very best I can to bring about a revolution; and if possible put the whole commercial transaction of the Republic in the hands of the proper organs which are the country people, this vow and pledge I make to the whole christian world fearlessly of the consequences, I do this with the stubborn fact that not a cargo of foreign merchandize has ever been purchased by the direct labour and industry of the Americano Liberians and as it is the principle of good political economy I hope to be able to turn the streams into their proper channels, as the laborer should always have an equivalent for his services, and if any one considers that they get well paid for their toil in hacking wood and oil to the sea coast let them but try it for themselves and after that they will be silent, I make this effort also with the conviction that no government can prosper when the citizens in general may be acting as factors, and any man or men that holds forth the Idea that we as a people are to uphold our civil institutions through the medium of commerce alone have very little foresight as to what must be the disastreous consequences in the future And he need not wait for the events of the future to display the results but view the present signs of the time and if he is a person of truth he will admit that vice and crime are stealing upon us as a nation in frightful rapidity; and in order to check the growing evil, all must go to work with hands and head to produce some thing for export, as well as natives do and then it will appear that justice is to be dealt out to all, But as it now is I look forward to the time when, if things be not altered, a domestic slavery will be introduced into the Rebublic in order to support the indolence and luxury of the few and to secure and maintain this state of things the poor savage must be kept in ignorance. And here I would inquire if this be not so, why so little on a general scale has been done for them, for it is the only effectual way of perpetuating the system of commerce, as now prosecuted in the Republic, which, according to my humble opinion will be the effectual means of undermining the virtues and Christian religion of a Republican people, and of branding us with the stigma of a vicious and wicked people. Do you, my readers, become startled at my expression? Am I going too far in what I have said? Have I uttered more than the truth! Yes, you may think so, yes, the high the low, the thoughtful and thoughtless may look upon me as a strange being, a hard customer; but unless you can convert truth into error, I will not turn so long as I am convinced that I am right, I have hinted only at a few things, and that merely to manifest the interest I feel in my native brethren, I am desirous to impart into them, by my labors, some spiritual gift.

Noblah's is about sixty miles from Bexly, and can be reached by a walk of one day and a half. This site would be an excellent place for an American settlement The people have everything plentiful around, and would with a little effort, have a superabundance. The surrounding country is most delightful; and no one disposed to live in the country for the good of the aborigines could have any objections to a residence in this place. It is hardly worth while to add that the soil is good; as all acquainted with this part of Africa are aware of the fertile state of the country.

May 2nd; Held prayers with the people; after which we received a goat that has been killed for us by the order of the head man. About 7 O'clock A. M. we left his town; and passing through some of his half towns and old farms we came to at a hill of considerable height heavily timbered, of very great extent at the top, so that it requires the greatest part of an hour to get over it. On the top is a cave the residence of numbers of bats which when disturbed fly about in the cave, ressembling in the noise which they make, the rearing of distant thunder. I was anxious to enter it but the mouth was very narrow and being desirous of hastening on, and no torches being furnished, I was obliged to declined entering, though not without much reluctance, as I percived that the natives associated much superstition with the cave. Not far from the cave I saw a company of red monkeys; these go in droves of about twenty or thirty, and likely more; we passed without molesting them, as it requires a good rifle to do any execution on such high trees The further side of the hill is quite steep, while the side we had ascended is very gradual. We soon saw here and there camwood trees some of which appeared to be sprouts from trees cut, years ago and some small ones having no dye about them as yet; there is no place in all the camwood forest, where it grows entirely by itself, but scattered; though, of course, more thick where least has been cut down, (which is the case in the Pessey camwood country) We passed over other hills and arrived at a town where they had cut a farm on the side of the hill on which it stood, opening to view the hill we had just passed over; as well as others several of which discribed a circle thereby making all deep valley of the most imposing sight; each hill standing as a tower to guard the dwellers in the vale; among thehills are to be found beautiful streamos of pure water which would apparantly give life to the dead by their exhilarating coolness & purity. We had passed many a stream that would afford good power for mills of any kind. And I think that the day will come when Africa's sons will be stir themselves and show to the world that they have a country not the least behind the best in other parts of the world: and if history is to be relied upon. I think there is no part of creation to be preferred to this part of Africa (this I do not say because I reside here or am a citizen of the Republic) but as a matter of fact, which I believe some of my own Brothers will disbelieve; and let it be so and let them remain in servitude all their days if they choose. We have a host of people to improve; and then we shall have thousands of the best of citizens, who have known no servitude: and who from their very infancy have been perfectly free. I should say that there are stones of different kinds throughout the country: and timber of the best quality—not to be surpassed by any in other parts of the world—both suitable for building houses. There are trees varying in diameter from ten feet to the size of a whip staff: and in the large forest you may walk about in every direction without any hinderance from vines—this was the condition of the large forest as far as I traveled. The palm tree is to be found as far out as I went, and in the Pessy country it appears to be in its proper element for I have never seen them grow taller, or bear better nuts which are small but more fleshy and producing more oil than the nuts in any other part of the country. Therefore let no one regard this part of Africa as a baren waste, for it is Just the opposite; and, it only requires the spread of the Gospel to make these solitary places glad I beleive that the time has come when God intends to raise up some to carry the word to these most distant parts of Africa. If those whose duty it is to preach the word, will not go beyond the limits of the civilized communities, God will give them leanness in their souls and quail in their full for meat.

We now started again and travel on to a gentlemans town by the name of Nicbozah who when he saw me and learned my business said that he and his people were very glad of the prospects, and as a token of this respect he furnished me with a small goat. He is a man of much life and humor and desired to have a school for his children. We passed on and about half past twelve O'clock we arrived at Zippos town, which I suppose to be about 91 miles from Bexly. It doubtless in time, has been a good town, but Zippo having lately died, they as usual let the town go down. The town is ruled by his son Sav—who appears to be a man of quiet dispositon—It is about here the camwood is found more plentifully, and near the town is a creek of pleasant water where the inhabitants say Elephants come to drink and wash, I bathed in it and felt much refreshed by the bath, and would advise all travlers, to do the same—a practice to often omitted, hence the cause of so many diseases that attack persons goving into the country. We stoped for the night at this town, preached to the people in the afternoon—who seemed very attentive and expressed a desire to have a preacher and teacher: and they should have one sent them who is willing to devote himself to the cause of Christ. Rose early in the morning and had prayers with the people and when the boys had eaten a little rice we started—about 7 o'clock—crossed the creek above mentioned, and came to a place where we saw the fresh track of an Elephant. They make a path by which you can trace them as far as they go—breaking through vines &c.

Further on we came a to place where they had pushed down palm trees and taken out the cabbage as clean as if it had been done by human hands. I also saw many low palm trees from which they had taken the cabbages, I saw many other trees which it appeared they had been feeding on in the same way and in doing so they reach from six to ten feet. At another place I saw where an Elephantafter being in mud—had passed between two trees touching each on side a detance of about six feet high, I measured a foot print and it was 6 by 11 inches—still it was not as large as some I saw, I also saw many other places where they had been feeding tearing up trees—and clearing off large spots by their ponderous weight they break down small tree and bushes. We were about an hour passing through the Elephant range—

After this we came to a branch of the St: John River—which is about an hundred and twenty feet wide: its course is usually rapid—this we crossed on a raft pulling ourselves over by a ratan string—Thence we passed to Grahway's through a delightful country passing many deserted towns, We arrived at Grahway's place about 12 O'clok A M. after resting a little we presented Grahway's with some tobacco who on receiving it remarked that if the Pessy people have such good tobacco he regretted it much; this I noticed, as it is known to all that the Bassas are prejudiced against the Pessys and regard them as an inferior tribe, simply on account of their getting their supplies of slaves from them at the time the trade was carried on. The Pessys in return look the Bassa and Liberians as inferior to them. As regards this I do not know but what they are correct for they are the only people I have seen that are truly and fully independant for they are not under the necessity of calling on any other part of the world for the least articles requisite for their comfort. They make their own clothes, iron, tobacco, pipes, bowls, basins, pots, bread, meat, oil, salt and every thing necessary for sustenance, and the rendering of life comfortable. I will say more about them when the proper time comes. After relating to Grahway's our object, we were received with the greatest marks of joy and respect.

We passed on (but I should not forget to mention that at this town of Grahway's I saw them burning camwood as common fire-wood) to Barlergrees town which is of considerable size: the people were glad to see us this far back from any American settlement, and, not a single individual offered the least mark of opposition to the objects we had in view: but on the other hand bid us Gops' speed. We here rested having walked about two hours and a half—but Barlergrees not being in town; we passed on Bogee's town—the last on the path—of Bassa towns, it is situated near a creek well adopted to Mill purposes. Hear we were received with gladness as usual—and the head man seemed disposed to show us every mark of respect, and was rojoiced to see us coming out so far to prose cute our object—he also expressed wish to have a teacher and preacher to instruct his people, and as an encouragement to their coming said that he would provide a place for them to stay—We put up with him for the night—and as usual preached to the people next morning who gave great attention and confessed their ignorance and superstition. To be continued

MONROVIA JULY 11. 1855.

AN AFRICAN NATIONALITY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the oppressions and afflictions under which the descendants of Africa have suffered for centuries—oppressions which, increasing more and more, appeared to crush them with their ponderous weight and to render extinct every noble emotion and lofty aspiration of the soul; yet, there are to be found many, even in countries where, as a class, they are most proscribed, who entertain feelings of national pride—and desire earnestly an African nationality—a "tangible, separate existence "as a people. It was this desire that influenced the people of Liberia to leave the Western world, risk the perils of the great deep—and brave the dangers of a residence in a barbarous country, far from the influence and comforts of civilization. They looked to the four quarters of the globe; they contemplated the political condition of different countries; but in none did they see so favorable an opportunity of establishing and maintaining a separate nationality as in Africa. This is the natural home of the black man, whence he was torn by the hands of avarice and carried to distant lands where he has been made to pass through rivers of sorrow, and to drink deep of the cup of affliction and degradation.

But, by the wonder working providences of God, a way is opening for the return of the dispersed; a few have already returned, and have succeeded in laying the foundation of a Christian empire, which, advancing with rapid and hopeful progress, is giving unmistakable evidence that it is a child of Divine Providence, destined by Him to accomplish high and noble purposes in connection with this benighted continent.

While, however, Liberia, the brightest star that ever shed lustre upon the condition of the colored man, points so encouragingly to the future, and invites the sons of Africa from all lands to participate in the glory of building up a nation, there are many who, though groaning under, and praying for deliverance from a bondage that" finds no palliative in merit—no consolation in piety—no hope in intellectual and moral pursuits—no rewards in industry and enterprise" are disposed to impede her progress, and thus to close the very opening through which it seems the design of Providence to answer their prayers for enfranchisement and elevation. Many, in their opposition, reason as follows: "Degradation has been attached to our race in the Western world; we have been oppressed in America, and if we are ever elevated, let us be elevated here, among our oppressors; let us rise among our despisers, and stand with them on the same level; let us be men among men, not among heathen Africans; if we have any intellectual and moral powers let them be manifested here." It matters not how much plausibility may be on the face of this argument, and how much importance some may attach to it, to the calm and reflecting mind, it must appear trivial and fallacious. We hold that there is as much of Providence connected with the humiliation and thraldom of our race as there was with the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt. We believe that all that has been done to enslave and degrade us, has been done under the permission of an Omnipotent and merciful Being. The groans and cries of the oppressed have now reached His ears, and the time when He intends to make the "wrath of man to praise" Him is fast approaching: He is bringing about a year jubilee for us; and it becomes us to follow His guidance—to go whither He says go. Had the Israelites when, in their Egyptian bondage, they received the intimation that they were to be returned to the land of Canaan, whence their forefathers had emigrated, resisted and said, "We will not go up thither; we desire to settle in some remote part of Egypt the very land in which we suffered afflictions, and, free from the trammels of the Egyptians, to establish our national religion and institutions; that we may, contiguous to our oppressors, be elevated to equal greatness with them:—had they reasoned thus we say, is it likely they would have been rescued from their painful captivity? No; they would have incurred the Divine displeasure, and would, perhaps, have fallen under the inflictions of his judgments. See what fearful punishment befel those of them, who having left Egypt, murmured in the wilderness.

And will any one say, that the hand of Providence is not concerned in our case as a people? Let such a one study our history for the last three or four centuries; let him watch us pursued by avaricious adventurers, snatched from our homes under circumstances the most heartrending and cruel, and carried to distant lands; let him follow us thither, and notice us amidst our sufferings—afflictions and brutal oppressions: and let him consider that, notwithstanding our mental and physical depression it may still be recorded of us, in all the countries of our exile as of the children of Israel in Egypt,—"And they were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceedingly mighty; and the land was filled with them." After he has noticed these things, let him turn to Liberia and study her career from the period of her incipiency in 1821 to the present time—a little more than thirty years have elapsed since the landing of the first pilgrims, and now behold a nation acknowledged by the Great Powers of the earth, with prospects, encouraging and glorious, destined to bring about the accomplishment of the prophetic declaration—"Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God." After he has pondered all these things, let him say, whether he doubts the special interference of Providence with us as a race; if he does, then he is the miserable possessor of a scepticism the character of which there is no epithet in English sufficiently forcible to express.

Every considerate mind must admit, that our whole history, from the fifteenth century down to the present, bears marks of providential intervention; and viewing the signs of the times we are led to the conclusion that we are destined, i. e. a large portion of us—to return to these shores, both for our own progress and elevation, and for the recuperation of our brethren, sunken in ignorance, superstition and vice. Barriers the most insurmountable are opposed to our advancement in the Western world. Such is the nature of the relative circumstances of the two races there, that if they remain together the one, must, necessarily, be kept inferior to the other. The whites, as a general thing, are the possessors of mental cultivation and pecuniary ability—qualifications indispensable to progress, respectability and greatness; while the blacks are for the most part uneducated, poor, and, consequently,—degraded. Two distinct races, existing together under such circumstances.—between whom there is no affiliation—must exist in the relation of superior and inferior. It seems perfect madness, therefore for a few persons of the inferior and proscribed class to contend for equal rights and privileges against so over-whelming a majority. Considering this state of things, and believing as we do in the special care of Providence over us, we are compelled to the inference that it is His will that the races shall be separated, and that He has chosen Africa—our proper home—as the grand asylum to receive our race. Yes:

"Despite of every yoke she bears
This land of glory still is theirs."

We do not wish to be understood to mean, however, that because America is not the home of the colored man, he should, therefore be oppressed and despised—that he should be deprived of the inalienable rights of man. No; the Almighty, by clothing him with all the attributes of human nature, has placed him on an equality with the rest of mankind; and no obstruction should be thrown into the way of his elevation by his neighbours. If, by his intellectual and moral worth, he can rise in the United States, he should be allowed to rise: and those who through unholy prejudice against his complexion, endeavor to oppress him, are unworthy of the name of freemen—recreant to their professed principles of liberty and independence. But we do contend that even if the African were allowed equal rights with the whites in the countries of his degradation, he should not be content, without a country—without a home of his own—without a nationality; when his father land, lies unpossessed, uncultivated, and, with inviting voice bids him come Home—and assist in hastening her redemption.

There will, no doubt, be some to differ from us, with regard to certain sentiments advanced above; but they are conclusions at which we have arrived after careful deliberation; and though they may now be vehemently opposed, by those not willing to look calmly at the subject, it is our most serious impression, that, sooner or later our colored brethren in the countries of their disfranchisement, will discover that all their efforts to reach a position of eminence and respectability are vain and fruitless. They will discover that it is by far more desirable and honorable to be a nation among the nations of the earth—than merely men among men. They will perceive the necessity and importance of an "African nationality;" and, compelled by these considerations, and the force of circumstances beyond human control, will flock to these shores, and aid in establishing what they now despise—a nation of colored men on the Western Coast of Africa: they will come to swell the number already here, and assist in promoting the honor and prosperity of Liberia, from which they have so long kept aloof; they will come to increase the salutary influence now exerting upon the benighted nations around, and impart to them the blessings of civilization.

"Liberia, happy land! thy shores
Entices with a pleasant charms:
And calls—his wearied thraldom over—
His ancient exile to her arms.
Come hither son of Afric, come,
And o'er the wide and weltering sea,
Behold thy lost yet lovely home,
That fondly waits to welcome thee."

EDUCATIONAL.

THE ALEXANDER HIGH SCHOOL—which has been reorganized, with very favorable prospects—has been removed from the Iron house to the building formerly occupied by Mr. A. Washington, on Broad Street—down stairs; Revd: David A. Wilson, the Principal, and Revd: John White assistant, with their families occupying the upper part. This institution is no doubt destined to accomplish a vast amount of good in Liberia. May the most sanguine expectations of its benefactors and friends, with reference to its usefulness, be realized!

THE MONROVIA ACADEMY—We learn that Revd: James W. Horne Principal of this institution, now on a visit to the United States, will return in a few months with an asistant; when its operations will probably be enlarged.

FOR YOUNG MISSES—A school for young misses has been opened in the Seminary building, (up stairs) under the auspices of the M. E. Mission, by Miss Caroline M. Brown, lately from the United States.

ASHMUN INSTITUTE—From a recent American paper we learn that a literary institution with this title—given in honor of the devoted Jehudi Ashmun, a name as familiar as household words in Liberia—has been established in the State of Delaware, under the care of the Presbyterian Church, for the purpose of training pious colored youth for the work of the Ministry and teaching, with special reference to Africa. The Presbyterian General Assembly at its last Session in May last, "endorsed the enterprise with great cordiality," and passed the following resolution:"—

Resolved, That this General Assembly has heard with pleasure of the design and practical effort on the part of the Presbytery of New Castle, (Del) to establish a school in which colored young men of piety may receive a thorough Classical and Theological education, fitting them for the work of the Ministry and for teaching among the destitute thousands of this country, and the Millions of Africa."

The New York Times thinks that the cry of the age ought to be. "There is no God but Mammon, and Dry Goods is his Prophet."

EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

(Gathered from the London News)

FROM THE SEAT OF WAR there is nothing new. Preparations are still going on for a desperate attack on Sebastopol, that, in the estimation of some, impregnable fortress. Several sorties had been made from Sebastopol, by the Russians, but had been vigorously repulsed. On the 26th of April, General Canrobert, commander of the French forces, addressed the army. He stated that large reinforcements were about to arrive, which would enable the Allies to enlarge their basis of operations. In the course of his speech he remarked, "France and England demand the taking of Sebastopol—it shall be taken. If we cannot enter by the gate we shall enter by the window—"coute qui coute. Sebastopol sera pris.

News from Eupatoria states that a reconnaissance had been made by Omer Pacha, the commander of the Turkish forces, who ascertained that the village of Saki, in the vicinity, contained 25 00 Russians, and a considerable quantity of war materiel. There was some rumor of an intention to take possession of the village.

THE BALTIC FLEET under Admiral Dundas left Foro sound on the 8th of May. The Gulf of Finland was reported as packed with ice from Revel to Finland, so that all communication with the shore was impracticable.

FINLAND—The most recent accounts from Finland mention the activity of the Russians, in preparing for the defence of the country. to give particulars of the corps that have arrived there from the interior. The Grand Duke Constantine is said to be indefatigable in his exertion to organize the Russian navy and has drawn up a plan by which all the line-of-battle ships are to be fitted with steam machinery.

RUSSIA—The most important intelligence from St Petersburg is that of the resignation of of Count Nesselrode, caused, it is said, by his opposition to the war party in the Cabinet.

Loud complaints are said to prevail among the peasantry in various parts Russia, on account of the heavy requisitions made by the Government; and it is supposed that, if the causes of these complaints continue, the Government will find work enough for a large portion of its army at home.

ENGLAND—On the 18th of May, her Majesty distributed "Crimean medals" to the officers, noncommissioned officers and invalided and wounded soldiers returned from the war. The names of the officers &c entitled to the decoration—commencing with those of the Grenadiers, next the Coldstreams, and the Scots Fusilier Guards were called over by the Deputy Adjutant—General, and each person passing in succession was presented with the Crimean medal commemorative of his gallantry. As each soldier came up Lord Panmure handed to the Queen, the medal to which he was entitled, and the soldier, having saluted her Majesty, passed on. In less than an hour her Majesty distributed 500 medals to as many officers and men.

FRANCE—An attempt had been made to take the life of the Emperor by one Pianori, supposed to be one of a secret society—whose object is to bring about the death of his Imperial Majesty. The assassin was apprehended, and was after a short trial guillotined on the 14th of May. It said that almost to the last moment of his life, the authorities repeated to him an offer, which had been frequently made—that his life should be spared, if he would discover his confederates. His only answer was that he had no revelation to make.

THE PRESENT EXHIBITION was opened on the 15th of May by the Emperor who, at the conclusion of his speech remarked, "I open with happiness this Temple of Peace, which invites all nations to concord."

M. DROUYN DELHUYS, late Minister for Foreign Affairs is said to have resigned or to have been requested to resign his office, on account of his great love for peace à tout prix. M. Persigny is said to have been appointed in his place.

SARDINIA it is stated has sent 4000 Piedmontese troops, under General Marmora, to the Crimea, to assist the Allies.

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE.

The most important and interesting intelligence is the passage by the Legislature of New York, of a prohibitory, liquor law. It appears that in the late elections, the friends of Reform, in that State, have been remarkably successful in the election both of State and city officers. MYRON H. CLARK, the new Governor of the state FERNANDO WOOD, the new Mayor of the city of New York; are both staunch friends of the Temperance cause; and are exerting themselves for its promotion. The licenses expired on the 8th of May. Persons selling spirits in less quantities than five gallons are now liable to a fine of 25 dollars for each offence. The liquor-dealers are attempting to prove that the prohibition was unconstitutional, and were endeavoring to obtain legal opinion to that effect. There was to be a great gathering of teetotallers at Boston, Massachusetts, in May, the Governor was expected to preside on the occasion.

KANSAS—The papers teem with complaints against the disgraceful scenes enacted by the pro-slavery party in the late election, in the territory of Kansas. The citizens of that territory expelled their Governor, and summoned the different districts to send one delegate each to Leavenworth city to select a Governor, whose appointment the President of the United States, was to be requested to confirm. The expelled Governor, the Hon. A. H. Reeder, returned to Pennsylvania where he was welcomed by a public meeting.

NEW MEXICO—Accounts from New Mexico state that skirmishes had taken place between the Government troops and parties of Utah and Apache Indians.

CALIFORNIA—PRO-SLAVERY—A "Know Nothing convention was held at Sacramento city at which it was determined to support the nominees of the American party at the next Presidential election; to uphold the Constitution in all its compromises; and to maintain the principles embodied in the Nebraska Bill to their fullest extent.

CURIOUS PROPHECIES OF THE WAR

We find the following communications in the Illustrated London News of May 19, and 26.

The REV DR CUMMING begs to enclose to the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS the following very curious old predictions, which, in reference to our present position must interest.

7, Montague-place May 14.

The Rev Dr Cumming quoted, in the course of a series of lectures he had been giving in Hallkin-street. Belgrave-square, the following remarkable anticipation of present events—not, as he said as of inspired prophecies, but as proofs of early and sound interpretation of inspired prophecy. The following lines he quoted from an old volume of predictions, written in the fifteenth century. In 1453 the Turks took Constantinople. The poet says:—

In twice two hundred years, the Bear
The Crescent will assail;
But if the Cock and Bull unite,
The Bear will not prevail.

But mark, in twice ten years again—
Let Islam know and fear—
The Cross shall stand the Cresent wane,
Dissolve and disappear.

The rev lecturer also quoted from a work in the Augustinian monastery at Rome, entitled "De fluctibus mysticae navis, 1675," in which are these remarkable words:—"Before the middle of the nineteenth century seditions will be excited every where in Europe; famines, pestilences, and earthquakes will spread desolation over many cities: Rome will lose her sceptre, the Pope will be made captive by his own people. A Prince from the North will overrun Europe; his sword will vigorously defend the Church, uphold the orthodox faith and subdue the Moslem."

These, said the lecturer, were plainly drawn from inspired prophecy. Their fulfilment is evidence of their origin.

(NOTE OF THE EDITOR—Perhaps Dr Cumming will inform the world of the title of the "old volume" written in the fifteenth century, and further state where it may be seen? Without such information "the cock and bull" referred to in the "prediction" will be applied, we fear, both by good and by ill-natured readers, to designate the character of the Rev Doctor's communication, to our columns.)

The Rev Dr Cumming sent the following reply:—

THE CRESCENT AND THE CROSS.

Dr Cumming presents his compliment to the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS and begs sincerely to thank him for his obliging kindness in giving insertion to his extract and communication.

Dr Cumming received the curious lines in his communication, with many other analogous and in so far interesting, incidents connected with the war, which he referred to as fragments of truth apparently drifted from an original; or as happy anticipations of recent events. The eight lines in question were sent from a clergyman, a correspondent of Dr Cumming, in a letter, in which he says:—"These lines were copied by a brother clergyman from an old book of predictions, dated the fifteenth century, in the possession of a gentleman living at Chard, in Gloucestershire."

On writing to his correspondent a few weeks ago, requesting the exact date of the volume, it appeared,—from the letter not reaching him—that he had changed his Curacy, and probably gone to another part of the country. It was suggested that Dr Cumming should send the lines to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, or Notes and Queries in order to ascertain thereby their real origin and date. Having taken the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS from its commencement and being aware of its great literary connections, he determined to send his curious lines to that Journal, under the persuasion that some of its correspondents more learned in such researches than he is would cast light on them.

It seemed to him doubtful if the three national names (the Bear, Bull, and the Cock) were so early applied to Russia, England and France; though whether the lines be forty years or four hundreds years old the anticipation would be equally remarkable. The Turks have a tradition among themselves that four hundred years from their capture of Constantinople ends their encampment in Europe. This may be the origin of the prediction in the lines already given. The subject has no intrinsic value beyond its singular accuracy; if old, as an anticipation of the future—either based on conjecture, or on traditional remains of truth, or as a reflection and interpretation of prophecy higher than man's, but in any case having no claims to any higher inspiration than human.

THE PRINTER'S TOIL.

Click, click, his types go dropping,
Here and there upon the case,
As he stands for hours popping
Every letter in its place.

Heaven send the useful printer,
Every comfort mortal need!
For our nights were dull as winter,
Had we not the news to read.

And would be the world's condition,
If no printer boys were found;
Ignorance and superstition
Sin and suffering would abound.

Yea, it is the busy printer,
Rolls the car of knowledge on,
And a gloomy mental winter,
Soon would reign if he were gone.

Money's useful, yet the minters
Fill not half so high a place;
As the busy toiling printers,
Fing'ring type before the case.

Yet while type they're busy setting,
Oft some thankless popinjay;
Leaves the country, kindly letting,
Printers whistle for their pay.

O, ingratitude ungracious!
Are there, on enlightened soil,
Men with minds so incapacious
As to slight the printer's toil!

See him how extremely busy,
Fingering type before the case
Toiling til he's almost dizzy
To exalt the human race.

Long life to the art of printing
Here on happy Freedom's soil!
And, with joys that knows no stinting
Heaven reward the printer's toil.

MILITARY POWER OF FRANCE—It is said that nothing can well exceed the complete efficiency of the military resources of France. She has literally five armies—one at Boulogne, consisting of no less than 60 battalions, each 1,000 strong, and 50 squadrons, with 20 foot or horse batteries. One at again, at Lyons, consisting of 3 divisions of infantry, and one of cavalry, or 20 battalions, 16 squadrons, and 10 batteries, one, also, at Paris, which, besides its two divisions of 22 battalions, its 20 squadrons, and 5 batteries, contains, in addition, as special garrison troops, two battalions of foot guards, four squadrons of horse guards, one battalion of sapeurs pompers, and as a reserve corps, 11, battalions, 10 squadrons, and four batteries of the Imperial Guard; one, too in the East, 90,000 strong; and lastly, one in Africa, which with the division—of occupation at Rome, form together 30,000 bayonets or sabres. To this force are yet to be added 10 more regiments, not brigaded of 21 active battalions, an armed police of 20,000 men, and 100 depot battalions, that daily receive young soldiers, until the accession of 140 000 men lately decreed, making altogether a French complement of something like 600 000 soldiers.—N. Y. Independent.

GEORGE CATLIN, the famous Indian portrait painter, of the red men, has been heard from on the head waters of the Amazon, painting the portraits and taking notes of the manners of the uncouth tribes in those regions—London News

COMPLAINT BOOK—The new Mayor of New York has opened a complaint book where all who have grievances in connection with city affairs may register them. Not a day goes by that entries are not made. The majority consist of protests concerning the filthy condition of streets, charges against the contractors complaints against mock—auctioners, allegations concerning frauds upon emigrants &c. In one case a woman stated that she had been charged twelve dollars for a single day's board, and this with miserable accommodations. The idea of the Mayor is not a new one, and while it will be productive of good, it may also lead to the indulgence of much personal ill will.—Presbyterian.

PRESIDENTS OF THE UNITED STATES—There have thus far been fourteen Presidents of the United States, and seven of these, viz: George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison; James Monroe, John Tyler, Wm. H Harrison, and Zachary Taylor, were born in Virginia; Two viz: Martin Van Buren, and Millard Fillmore, were born in New York, Two were born in Massachusetts; viz John Adams and John Quincy Adams, One viz Andrew Jackson was born in South Carolina. One, James K. Polk, was born in North Carolina; and one, Franklin Pierce was born in New Hampshire. Messrs Van Buren, Tyler, and Fillmore, are the only survivers of the ex-Presidents. General Taylor, and General Harrison, were the only two Presidents that died in office. The term of the first chief Magistrate commenced on the 30th of April 1789, and the term of the last commenced on the 4th of March, 1853. It will expire on the 3rd of March 1857. The Vice Presidency is vacant at this time, in consequence of the death of the Hon. W. R. King of Alabama. Press

PRICE OF ADVERTISING—The price of advertising in the London Illustrated News is six cents per word. The London Times has recently largely increased its rates, which, compared with those of American news-papers, are enormous.

GENTLEMEN'S EXTRAVAGANCE versus LADIES—A contemporary thinks that two much has lately been said by many persons and journals concerning Ladies ruining their husbands by extravagance, in buying silk dresses and such other expensive articles," He says that enormous bills the use of tobacco segars, and liquors, by gentlemen been alluded to which I am sure is quite as important an item as ladies, silk dresses." This is a fair hit. The value of the segars imported into the United States in the fiscal year 1854, was $3,311,635. and of unmanufactured tobacco about $1,000000 more in value was imported. And the tobacco and segar which pass through the Custom House is but a small proportion, indeed, of the quantity consumed in this country. The value of the liquors imported during the same year was $7,188,820

SABBATH MORNING.

Holy morn, fit emblem of
Futurity's blissful hour. Heaven's blue arch
Calmly glows, untinctured by a cloud;
Purity's bright spirit breathes,
To every child of God, a holy,
Heavenly peace.
O! Sun of the Sabbath,
Yield thy brightest rays; dispel dark gloom
From every brow; within the human heart
Strew the flowers of Holiness. Ye cooling breezes
That fan the brows of the impious and the good,
Lade ye your pinions now with holy,
Happy thoughts, Peace to instill
Within the hearts of men.
This beauteous morn awakes,
To praise, and pray, and thanksgiving;
Let not deep-dyed sin, nor impure thought,
Invade its sanctity. Here in our land,
Where God is known, let not evil mar
Nature's Heaven-gifted quietude.
Ah! would throughout the Heathen shores,
The blessings of this day were known;
Would all the globe might render
Heart-felt praise unto the Lord,
Upon this consecrated morn.
Yet even now,
Many a goodly ship is sailing for
The Heathen coast; bearing thitherward
The man of God, to speak to their
Untutored minds the words of wisdom,
And the Lamp of God, wherein is written
The inspired words of Life and Light.
O! may a thousand swelling notes,
Thrilling from the Christian's lyre,
Echo and re-echo throughout the regions
Of the Asiatic land; and may Chinese hearts
In gentle submission be taught to bow
Unto the Almighty One. May Religion's sun
Cast its effulgent rays o'er all
The darksome gloom of Heathen hearts.
This tranquil Sabbath morn
Exciteth holy thoughts; unto the heart
Whispering of a morn, a blessed morn,
When the mighty Saviour triumphed.
Lo! many a flower,
Of immortal stamp, has fled our Earth,
And many a bud has come to grace
The parent stem, since that bright
And glorious morn that dawned—
The resurrection day; the glorious day,
By Heaven's decree, that shed
A wondrous light abroad,
Bequeathing purity of soul to each
Repentant rebel, and a home
Beyond the mystic vales of Death,
Of blissful joy eternally. Press: Herald

OUR GIVEN NAMES.

We say given names, not Christian names, as is more common; for it is not every one having a first name that has a Christian name, as was exemplified in the case of Mr. Levi, who appeared as a witness before the Lord Mayor of London.

"What is your Christian name, Mr. Levi?" said that civic functionary.

"I have not got any, my Lord," was the reply. "I am a Jew, but my first name is Moses."

Various are the tastes in the selection of a name for a child—various are the motives that influence the decision. Sometimes a rich friend or relative is to be conciliated, and therefore some barbarous designation is affixed to a child that is a thorn in his side as long as he lives; and after all, the unfortunate may miss the expected legacy. Sometimes the name of some distinguished man is selected, to which the life of the new wearer adds no new lustre; thus we see George Washington and John Wesley occasionally figuring in the police reports, as the names of people arrested for riot or petty larceny. A classical taste inspires others, who are not always very particular in the name, provided they smack of the ancients, owing to which it happens that there is a boy now living in Philadelphia who has been christened—it we may thus use the word—after Commodus, one of the most infamous of the Roman Emperors.

The late Bishop Chase, of Illnois, had a dislike to having Greek and Roman names imposed upon children, which he displayed very pointedly on one occasion when a child was brought to him to be baptized.

"Name this child," said the Bishop.

"Marcus Tullius Cicero," answered the father.

"What!"

"Marcus Tullius Cicero."

"Tut! tut! with your heathen nonsense!—Peter, I baptize thee," and the child was Peter thenceforth and forever.

Others, again, set much store by Scripture names, many of which, to our ears, are anything but melodious—for instance, Obadiah, Jeremiah, and all the other iahs; but this fashish is not near so prevalent as it was a century or two ago. Some of the Bibe names have much sweetness, such as Beulah, Ruhamah and Rhoda, but even these are rarely used.

The story is well known of the man, who, having called four sons after Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, wished to have the fifth christened Acts, because, as he said, he "wanted to compliment the Apostles a bit;" but the sequal, as given by Mr. Lower, in the last edition of his valuable work on "English surnames," is not so familiar to us. It appears that the father had two sons, who were christened Richard and Thomas, and that the story of the name that had been proposed for No. 5, getting wind amongst his schoolmates, he was constantly annoyed with having this distich repeated, of better meter than rhyme—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke and John,
Acts of 'Postles, Dick and Tom."

Some persons appear to have tried how near they could come to the height of absurdity, in giving names to their children. Benjamin Stokely, the first white settler in Mercer county, Pennsylvania, (whose account thereof is in the fourth volume of Memoirs of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania,) gave most extraordinary names to all his children; at present, but one of them occurs to our memory. Aurora Borealis—by which he thought proper to designate one of his daughters A Mr. Stickney, a distant relative of Dr. Franklin, numbered his children, calling them One Stickney, Two Stickney, &c.

We live venture to add a few rules, which are the results of our reflections upon this subject.

1. The son should not be called after his father, nor the daughter after her mother.

The object of giving first names is to distinguish a person from all others bearing the same last name particularly from those of his immediate family; but this latter is not attained when a child bears the name of a parent.—Confusion must always follow, not always, to be avoided by the additions of senior and junior, or the designations 1st, 2nd, &., which are common in New England.

An eminent lawyer, who adorned the Philadelphia bar, forty or fifty years ago, had a son with the same first name as himself, who was studying law in his office. One day a letter arrived without an addition of "junior," but intended for the younger, which the elder gentleman and read. It was from a source not very creditable to any one.

"I am ashamed of you," said the father indignantly, handing it to his son.

"I am ashamed of you, sir," replied the son, handing it back, with his finger pointed at the direction.

One of the sons of Benjamin Stokely, of whom we have spoken above, was born during his father's absence from home. On his return, his wife told him that she had called the child Benjamin, after him.

"None of that," cried he, "I have no notion of hearing people talking of old Ben stokely."

This confusion is one objection to the practice which we condemn; another is that if a parent calls a child after himself, he is in danger of becoming partial to that child, at the expense of the others. This is a feeling which makes its way into the minds of even good men and good women; it seem to some that a child bearing their name in full, is more fully their representative than others. As this is all wrong, it is best to prevent the arising of such feelings, by giving no occasion for their existence.

2. The more common the last name is, the more uncommon should the first name be. We can pardon almost any prefix to Smith, Brown and Jones. As one of the learned fathers of the bar lately observed, in a discourse, "Who shall declare the generation of the Smiths, and especially of the John Smith?" The very mention of John Smith in a court house, police-office, or other public place—and it is of frequent mention,—brings a broad grin into every one's face immediately

3. No name should be given to a child that will suggest a ludicrous idea when written in fully, or when the initial letter only is used.

Middle aged persons, in Philadelphia, can recollect a druggist, named Ash, (now deceased) whose friends had selected Caleb for his first name. He was constantly annoyed with inquiries from school boys, and others of the rising generation, as to the residence of Mr. Calebash.

Forty or fifty years ago a very worthy little French tailor, named Frogg, resided in Charleston, S. C., and on the birth of one of his sons some wags persuaded him that it would be a very good thing for the child to call him after they chief magistfate of the State—Governor Bull, which was done accordingly, the unlucky combination of the two names never striking the father until it was too late.

4. Famales should not have but one given name, and when they marry, should retain their maiden name as a middle name. This is the practice among the Society of Friends, and were it generally adopted it would have many advantages. We should know at once, on seeing a lady's name, whether she was married or single, and, if the former, what the name of her family was. And it is further to be considered that the adoption of this rule of but a single first name for girls, would put an end forever to the whole brood of Emma Milvinas and Emphemia Helen Lauras, and a style of nomenclature which is thought by most persons to be ridiculous in the extreme.—Putnam's Magazine.

CHILDREN.—It is a mistake to think that children love the parents less who maintain a proper authority over them. On the contrary, they respect them more. It is a cruel and unnatural selfishness that indulges children in a foolish and hurtful way. Parents are guides and counselors to their children. As a guide in a foreign land, they undertake to pilot them though the sheals and quicksands of inexperience. If the guide allows his followers all the liberty they please; if, because they dislike the constraint of the narrow path of society, he allow them to stray into holes and precipices that destroy them, to slake their thirst in brooks that poison them, to loiter in woods full of wild beasts, or deadly herbs, can he be called a sure guide? And is it the same with our children? They are as yet only in the preface, or, as it were, in the first chapter of the book of life. We have nearly finished it, or are far advanced. We must open the pages for these younger minds. If children see that their parents do not find fault without reason; that they do not punish because personal offense is taken, but because the thing in itself is wrong—if they see that, while they are resolutely but affectionately refused what is not good for them, there is a willingness to oblige them in all innocent matters—they will soon appreciate such conduct.

If no attention is paid to the rational wishes—if no allowance is made for youthful spirits—if they are dealt with in a hard and unsympathizing manner—the proud spirit will rebel, and the meek spirits be broken. Our stopping to amuse them, our condescending to make ourselves one in their plays ane pleasures at suitable times, will lead them to know that it is not because we will not, but because we cannot attend to them, that at other times we refuse to do so. A pert or improper way of speaking, ought not to be allowed. Clever children are very apt to be pert, and, if too much admired for it, and laughed at, become eccentric and disagreeable. It is often very difficult to check our own amusements, but their future welfare should be regarded more than our present entertainment. It should never be forgotten that they are tender plants committed to our fostering care—that every thoughtless word, or careless neglect may destroy a germ of immortality—"that foolishness is bound up in the heart of a child"—and that we must ever, like watchful husbandmen, be on our guard against it. It is indeed little that we can do in our own strength, but if we are conscientious performers of our part—if we earnestly commend them in faith and prayer to the fostering care of their Father in heaven—to the tender love of Him, the Angel of whose presence goes before them, and who carries these lambs in his bosom—we may then go on our way rejoicing—for he will never leave or forsake those who trust in him."

SHE MAKES HOME HAPPY."—She always made home happy,' was the expressive sentence which a friend recently appended to an obituary notice.

It is woman's highest and most peculiar prerogative, whether mother, daughter, sister, or wife, to make home happy. The husband who is blessed with such a wife, has a prize and a home above all price. The children of such a mother will rise up and call her blessed. The benedictions of the poor and needy are largely bestowed upon her, for her beneficent acts.—Such a woman, whether maiden, or wife and mother, never thinks of the question of 'Woman's Rights,' popularly so called, but with shame and humiliation. Such women are fully persuaded that, if they would make the world happier, they must first make home happy.—And this would be impossible, if they were required to mingle at the polls, in Legislative bodies, to serve as jury-woman, as constables, high-way-serveyors, &c., &c., offices whose duties require much absence from home.

The highest praise that can possible be bestowed on woman is that 'She always makes home happy." Who that visits these occasional oases along life's chequered course, does not regret that the number of such home is not greatly augmented in view of such blessed fruits of domestic joy and peace and happiness on earth—making the family on earth a sweet foretaste of the future condition of the pure in heart.

The mother who has educated and trained her daughters for such a mission, has secured a great name and has done the world a better service, than all the blue stocking pedants and 'Woman's Rights' advocates that have ever lived. Blessed is the woman that has the art and heart to make home happy, and thrice blessed is he who has such a wife for she will do him good all the days of her life.—Rural New Yorker.

GOOD NIGHT.

Good night? a word so often said,
The heedless mind forgets its meanings;
'Tis only when some heart lies dead,
On which our own was leaning,
We hear in maddening music roll
That last "good night" along the soul.

"Good night!"—in tones that never die;
It peals along the quickening ear,
And tender gales of memory
Forever waft it near,
When stilled the voice, O crush of pain—
That ne'er shall breathe "good night again"

Good night!"—it mocks us from the grave—
It overleaps that strange world's bound
From whence there flows no backward wave—
It calls from out the ground,
On every side around—above,
"Good night, good night" to life and love

Good night! O wherefore fades away
The light that lived in that dear word?
Why follows that good night, no day,
Why are our souls so stirred?
O, ratheresay, dull brain, once more,
'Good night! thy time of toil is o,er!"

Good night:—now cometh gentle sleep,
And tears that fall like gentle rain,
Good night, O holy' blest and deep,
The rest that follows pain!
How should we reach God's upper light,
If life's long day had no "good night."

A DISCOVERY—A Mr Walworth, a Roman Catholic clergyman, of New York, recently undertook to demonstrate, from the pulpit, that hell was situated in the inside of the earth, commencing just twenty-one miles from the surface, or at that point where granite begins to melt. Now, as this shrewd and sharp sighted priest has fixed on the locality of hell, will he condescend to gratify us as to the precise locality of purgatory, concerning which Scripture leaves us so sadly in the dark—? Presbyterian

HON STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS AND THE LADIES OF STARK COUNTY, OHIO.

Most of our readers are aware of the excitement that prevailed in the United States, in the early part of last year, on account of the introduction into Congress of a bill commonly known as the "Nebraska bill," gotten up by S. A. Douglas of Illinois, providing for the extension of slavery, the abrogation of the Missouri compromise, &c &c The bill was passed in the face of numerous remonstrances from various respectable quarters. It appears that the Ladies of Stark County Ohio adopted the following method of expressing their indignation. The Salem (Ohio) Bugle thus introduces the subject;—

JUDAS HIS PRICE PAID.

The ladies of our neighbouring village of Alliance, have forwarded to Stephen A. Douglas the following letter accompanied with 30 pieces of silver—bright new three cent pieces. He has now only to go out and hang himself, and the parallel between him and his prototype will be complete:

To Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois:

We, the undesigned, wives, mothers, and daughters of Stark County, Ohio feeling grateful that our boasted 'land of the free and home of the brave' is yet so free that WHITE husbands, sons and brothers can yet enjoy their own liberty, are induced to present to you the enclosed thirty pieces of silver'.

If Judas was worthy of his reward for betraying One, in whose power to extract himself from the hands of his crucifiers he had full confidence, then much more are you worthy of this reward (if no office of emolument be proffered,) for this betrayal of liberty, for this attempt to cast into hands more brutal than Jewish crucifiers thousands of unoffending, weak and helpless fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, sons and daughters, accused of no infraction of religious or civil law, and whose blood is called for by no maddened populace, but by cold-blooded avarice and the worst of passions.

Without portraying this horrid picture further, may you receive the enclosed thirty pieces of silver' as a testimony of our regard, and ere you follow the last act of Judas, may you repent in deepest sackcloth, this most nefarious betrayal of liberty.

CIRCULAR.

FOREIGN OFFICE.
June 6 1855

Sir:

The Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs at St Petersburg has recently put in circulation a statement purporting to be a representation of a communication made by Captn: Watson, of Her Majesty's Ship. "Imperieuse," to the Russian authorities at Baltic Port, in one clause of which Captain Watson is alledged to have notified that foreign, that is to say, neutral vessels, "which might at that time be in Baltic Port "might quit the port but only in Ballast or "with cargoes which might not be Russian "property" and from this representation of the notification made by Capt: Watson the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs draws, and publishes as a warning to neutrals, the inference that the British Government has abandoned the principle proclaimed last year by Her Majesty in her Declaration of the 28th of March last that "Her Majesty will waive the right of seizing enemy's property laden on "board a neutral vessel, unless it be contraband "of war."

In another passage of the statement of the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Captain Watson is represented to have declared in answer to the inquiry whether neutral vessels allowed by him to depart from Baltic Port after the establishment of the Blockade in ballast or with cargoes, would be at liberty to pursue their voyage without risk of being detained by any of Her Majesty's cruisers which they might fall in with at sea, that he could not undertake that such would be the case, inasmuch as the Admiral commanding the British fleet might hereafter make other arrangements.

Her Majesty's Government are not surprised that such a publication on the part of the Imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs at St Petersburg has been the cause of some anxiety to [illegible] Powers, who could not [illegible] the Imperial Government [illegible] sort to the expedient of misrepresenting a notification made to Russian authorities on a point so deeply interesting to the commerce of States in amity with Russia.

Fortunately for the cause of truth and for the relief of Neutral Powers from the embarrassment which the statement put forth by the Imperial Ministry for Foreign Affairs was calculated to occasion, Her Majesty's Ship, "Imperieuse" is at the present moment in Portsmouth Harbour, having been obliged to return to England to repair damages sustained by her in a collision with another of Her Majesty's ships in the Baltic. Her Majesty's Government have therefore had the opportunity of communicating directly with Captain Watson, and of ascertaining from him exactly what passed on the occasion in question; And neutral nations will learn that the Imperial Government of Russia, has published to the world as true, a statement which as well as the inference that the Imperial Government has drawn from it, is wholly unfounded.

In regard to the first point, namely, the alledged prohibition to neutrals to export Russian produce on departing from a port placed under Blockade by Her Majesty's cruisers, Captain Watson has laid before Her Majesty's Government a letter, dated, the 1st Instant from Lieutenant De Kantzow, of Her Majesty's ship "Imperieuse" the officer employed by captain Watson to communicate with the Russian authorities at Baltic Port which states as follows:

Neutral ships lying in the harbour laden with "Russian produce (rye and gin were permitted "to, and did actually, proceed on their respective voyages. The Governor asked if I could "promise that they would never be molested or "interfered with; in answer, I stated that the "Proclamation of Her Majesty's was clear and "concise, and that he must abide by it, and in "the event of their being captured, the case "would be judged by the Admiralty court."

On the second point, namely that Captain Watson declined to give an assurance that vessels allowed by him to depart from Baltic Port would not be molested on their voyage, the same officer, Lieutenant DeKantzow, states "that the Governor asked permission for four fishing "boats, without decks, to be permitted to proceed "to Riga and that after I had acquainted you "(Captain Watson,) with the same, as well as "with the names of the neutral ships lying in "the port and their respective cargoes, I conveyed to him your permission that they might proceed, at the same time stating that you had no "intention of molesting the town, or any fishing "boats, but that you could not guarantee that "boats of that description would never be molested, as the commander in chief was expected, "and might issue different orders."

Her Majesty's Government abstain from commenting upon the course pursued by the Imperial Government of Russia in this matter; but I have to instruct you to give all possible publicity to this despatch in the country in which you reside.

I am,
Sir
Your most Obedient humble Servant,
(Signed) CLARENDON.

OF A TOUR INTO THE COUNTRY, INTERIOR OF GRAND BASSA,

BY GEORGE L SEYMOUR.

(Concluded)

Bogee's town has a kitchen in it that is supported by camwood posts or eight of the posts are camwood of about three dollars; so that camwood that distance is little accounted of and about this town and in this region the wood grows common and I saw it quite large; and I have walked over the roots of the camwood as any common tree, and when a person looks at the worth of the country he cannot but regret the great want of means of transportation. Had the people one to direct them in industry [illegible] per chance, they would [illegible] of the Republic [illegible] [illegible] that part of Africa; subdue the forests; tame the wilderness, roam the plain, cause the earth to disgorge her hidden treasures; improve the human mind and produce men as Hannibal of old; as well as to give men to the church eminent for piety and virtue. It will not be many years before a mighty city shall rear its lofty spires in the centre of Africa in ominous tokens of the fulfilments of the ancient saying that Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hand to God," yes my readers this will be the result, it is to come to pass, God has said it, the Lord of hosts has proclaimed it, it is his words and no man can put an effectual hindrance in the way, though they rage, and devils howl yet the angry, gates of Hell cannot prevail against the enterprise, destruction may do her worst but God will yet bless Africa and I think through the medium of the Republic of Liberia's. Who of the citizens will not come to the contest, who are not willing to share the honors of the field who I say will not make the sacrifice for the redemption of their fartherland, and give to its destitute inhabitants the word of life? We crossed the beautiful creek and travelled on for about three quarters of an hour passing through newly cut farms when one could here and there see considerable old stumps of cut camwood also large forest you could see it in profusion standing every where ready to be cut for market it; having stood for years, as also lying across the path and sides of the path and all about in the forest besides what is growing in large and small trees, the people think but alittle of wood at that place, however they have a camwood depot whence at leisure they bring some to the beach or sea coast to some Bassa gentlemen who exchange with them. The wood in this forest will furnish a large supply many years if they continue to bring it down as they have for years back, but if men of energy take hold of it and break the ox and horses into the draft the wood will be plentiful at all times and ready for market, King Dampa, is a man of great wealth, like the Lion he knows not his own strength but I hope this will not always be the case. Who will go to instruct and teach him, and his people, who I inquire is desirous of the task? who will forsake all christian association? who will forsake all for the good of souls in and among the Heathen of this land of our Fathers, who are our brethren in the flesh and claim our sympathy. We are placed here in the order of providence, to impart to them the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. What man when he remembers that his own parents or grand parents were in the same condition, and we their children have had the benefit of the captivity and are returning to impart the blessing to our kindred; who having been left in freedoms land and in darkness. (I wish the world to know that it is my opinion that oppression or slavery has accomplished some good for us as a people, although we as a nation have been wounded by the hand of avarice) let us teach our oppressors that we have sparks of humanity left in our bosoms and that no circumstance could extinguish it for it was implanted by the hand of God, and now enkindles the flame, by which our hearts grow warm for the safety of our brethren, and as a proof of the fact we have a city of refuge for all to flee to if they wish, who are abroad; and we have been for years building a bul-wark of safety for those of our Brothren that are found at home when we return and now when [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] want [illegible] that will engage in the work most, suffer loss and privation as soldiers of the cross of Christ.

Again to my journey; we passed the wood where we found a good quantity prepared for market; this appears to be situated at the out skirts of the camwood region as soon after leav[ing it] we were [illegible] region [illegible]

[illegible] advance of the Bassa every thing appears

different from what I had seen on my journey through the Bassa tribe, the people appeared happy and contented in the enjoyment of plenty. I was hailed with delight and felt that I was now near my journey's end and looked upon every Bassa man, woman and child as those to whom I was particularly sent to preach the gospel of the Kingdom; my heart was full; I felt for the people I was compelled to give vent to my feelings in tears for joy at the success of my tour and for sorrow at the destitute condition of the simple people, as it regarded their knowledge of divine things; and every object in the way sunk into insignificance at the prospect before me, and I felt for the moment that in God I was ready to chase a thousand and put ten thousand to flight, and to pass over every wall of opposition to the object in view I will come to this destitute people at my own charge in obedience to the command of God who I feel has instructed me his humble and unworthy servant by his providence and spirit to go and preach the gospel to the people (in particular in this I suppose some of my friends will brand me as an enthusiast but let this be as it may.) I shall go if not sent by men, if God commands and circumstatnces will admit, and here I will drop a remark to save trouble on the part of those who would advise to the contrary, that it will be useless, if my Lord's commands have the same impressions at the time I am ready to go, that they have now and have had for many weeks past; (and appear increasingly by to have) for I am at this moment ready to sacrifice every earthly thing that I have to be clear of every hindrance to the work: and the more I talk about it, pray about it, and write about it, the more my soul is drawn out towards the work, I therefore feel that I am not mistaken as to the will of God on this point; for I feel willing to take the commands of Jesus Christ in their literal sense, if need be, to carry the news of glad tidings to the heathen; Yes, Mr Herald I sacrifice my all, soul and body to the will of God, and above that I estimate nothing.

We passed on through the farm of which I have spoken, and came to a farm—kitchen where I found a young man, who appeared somewhat alarmed at us at first; but being informed of our object his fears subsided. Not far from him were some men cutting down the high bush and timber in a new farm, which was one of considerable extent they were notified and came to hail us, which they did, with much gladness.

From thence we passed on to a place where they were begining to build a few houses, and at which place I met, for the first time women and children, every thing appeared different: the people here seemed more thoughtful about agriculture and manufactures, I saw tobacco growing, and found that they preservd the seed as carefully as any other kind of seed; thence we passed on, by good paths, to a half town, where it appeared blacksmithing is done; but most of the people were out on their farms; yet the intelligences of our arrival passed from one to the other, like the wind, and there seemed to be a general restlessness among the people who were anxious to see a white man, (as they called Liberians) The paths now became better and better, which we took as an indication of proximity to the king's town, where we arrived at about 3 O'clock P. M. and were received by one of his head men with great cordiality—There I felt that my journey was at an end.

The following morning, his Majesty, who was out of town, arrived, and received me with marks of great respect; performing all the salutatory ceremonies—practised in the interior, which consist in first embracing the body of each other then letting go, shake hands, and then shake fingers. I proceeded immmediately to make my object known to the king. and after the matter was fully explained he fired a salute of several guns, I then presented him with some little notions, which created a considerable degree of pleasure, he soon after had a bountiful repast of "rice of and goat" prepared,—the goat was killed expressly for us—I was also presented with a country cloth and mat to sit on; neither of which is held in less estimate than elsewhere.

I now felt that I had, in a good degree accomplished the work for which I came, I therefore amused myself by walking about the town and looking at the people—their houses mode of living &c—The children, several of whom I took up in my arms, seemed not in the least alarmed, as is the case with children residing in towns nearer to the beach.—This town is not large, it consists of about twenty houses and three or four kitchens; they are mostly round; most of the cooking is done in the houses, which renders them of a very smoky appearance inside. They have couches or seats of clay in two or three different darts of the house. The kitchens are raised about eighteen inches with clay; so that one has a very dry comfortable place to sit on, as also for cooking purposes. They seem not disposed to cultivate bananas and plantains around their town as they might yet it might easily be done and the only reason I could see for their neglect in this respect was that, their necessities in this line are very few and are met by rice, and having no market for their supplies, they do not feel inclined to make any, extra exertion, merely for the sake of securing luxuries. The footpaths in the vicinity of this town, being cut frequently are very good. The soil is excellent, and inclined to great productiveness. The colah tree grows here, in abundance, and forms an article of considerable trade between this tribe and the more interior; being used by the latter as a dye and also for chewing. The Pessey tribe are not migratory in disposition; they reside for many years in one place; the graves of their dead are marked with flat stones placed at the head and feet, and frequently all around. There is quite a number of half towns in this region, and there appear to be numerous people under this king who is called Dahpey.

I learned that there were iron works a few miles from the main town; but had not time to visit them, I was also informed that about a day and half walk, there were cloth manufactories, and that two days walk thence, there were horses jacks, and long horned bullocks. This intelligence gladdened me; for with the cloth manufactory I associated the idea of millions of yards that could be made in a year out here in the country, if there were only some one here to give the natives a little more light as to the facilities for the speedier manufactory of cloth; with the horses, asses, and bullocks, I calculated the immense amount of work that might be accomplished, the ease and swiftness with which a journey might be performed, and the soil cultivated.

The next day which was Sunday, I preached to the people. They appeared very attentive and anxious to listen to the truth. I attacked their errors, as I did at other places, and they admitted that they were in a state of darkness. They said that no one had ever told them about their evil ways. They had no idols that I could see, yet like the Bassas, and other natives on this coast they had greegrees. Like their other brethren they had no fixed method of worship; no system of religion; and no one could be met with, whose ideas of his own responsibility to a superior being, and of future rewards and punishment were not most astonishingly vague and confused. On this account their minds are more easily accessible, conviction more readily gain admittance, to and fasten upon them. They all expressed, with the greatest warmth, desires for education for the children and youth among them; in fact this was the general desire wherever we travelled—O, Christian listen will ye not heed this Macedonian cry!—

The heathen perish day by day
Thousands on thousands pass away;
O Christians to their rescue fly,
Preach Jesus to them ere they die."

Christians of Liberia they are perishing at our doors. Let us be up and doing.

But to proceed with my narrative; These people are very inquisitive and seem apt to catch an idea of any thing new as soon as presented. They can be made by prayerful labor a good and great people: they posess no little sense of honor and courtesy. They seem very desirous of cultivating a friendly familiarity with all persons On Sunday and Monday I was introduced to some strange gentlemen, who appeared as manly in their deportment, as polite in their behaviour as any set of men can be expected to be under the same circumstances.

On Tuesday morning I prepared to return home; and left king Dahpey's tow about 9 O'clock A. M. with feelings of regret that I had to leave the dear people for my heart began to be riveted to them and from their expressions they seemed to feel as great a reluctance to part as I did.

Dahpey let me have several boys to return home with me; some to learn English, and some to carry wood for himself so that we numbered about thirty in all including the two Americans. Mr. Thomas Allen & Mr: William P. Crusoe, who were the only civilized persons that I had with me.

We arrived at the wood deposite about 11 O'clock and took from it some fifteen pieces for king Daphey, the boys taking small pieces for themselves, in addition to the pieces for the king. We parted from them, and hastily retracing our steps arrived at Barguh's town about ½ past one O'clock, P. M. Being invited to tarry for the night we complied, (And here I might mention that I drew up an instrument for the opening of the path—which was signed by king Dahpey and Bogee and almost every man on the path—from the Pessey country to Bexley, to keep the path free from hindrances; so that the Pessey people, may pass back and forth without molestation.)

As there was little of interest that transpired on our way home, except the increase of our number—of boys to be trained—to fifty odd, I will only add that I arrived home tolerably well on Tuesday May 18th when I sent the boys immediately to school. I shall now Mr. Herald with a few remarks come to a close.

From what I have seen, as related above, there is evidently a great and important work to be begun in the Interior; and these to begin and prosecute this work must have the idea of incessant toil, and the determination to "WORK ON WORK EVER." They must not go to sit in an armed chair—and feel so distant that they can not be touched with a ten foot pole for so dignified that every one must bow at their feet; but they must go having the humility, of the lambs the meekness of the dove, and wisdom and prudence of the serpent—they must have the spirit of Jesus Christ; and when they thus go they should be determined never to look back from the work: but come to the conclusion to give up every thing, lay aside every weight that may appear to hinder their efficiency in the labor of love; relying on the promises of God—remembering that the work is His, and that he will accomplish it in His own way and time.

And be it known that Liberia is destined to accomplish what England, France and the United States cannot; we in the order of Providence, are to redeem a continent. They have islands and portions of continents, we have more,—God has preserved this high and noble work for us, as an evidence that we are capable of grent undertakings; and I hope that very few of the "dominant race" as they proudly call themselves, will have any thing to do with our Liberian enterprises in the Interior; as I do not admit notwithstanding their repeated expressions that it requires the energy of the white to prosecute every considerable undertaking—I cannot admit that their skill and tact are indispensable to the successful prosecution of every great work. Let them do in their own country with the same means more than we do in this. Man is but man—place him where you will—give him whatever color, hair or features you choose, and after all that you may say and do, you'll find him a man—a creature of circumstances.

I now inquire, Mr. Herald, if there are no young men in this christian nation willing to aid in the establishment of a line of operations from different points of the Republic to the Interior for the redemption of Africa? Will none come to the rescue of millions from darkness and death? O let not white men plead so fervently for our people, and we not endorse their sentiments by timely effort and action! Let us not stand in the disgraceful attitude of do nothing; let not the thousand of dollars spent in Liberia for the good of souls produce so little effect, on account of our inactivity and supineness. And let me ask, what has been the return for the amount of $32,000 appropriated last year, 1854 for the Methodist E. Mission in Liberia? This is a question of no little weight and importance when we consider the ease, with which our native brethren may be approached and the eagerness with which they are looking—and waiting for the word of life.

The native begins to fully understand that the only difference between him and us is, that we have the gospel, and he has not; and who will deny that there is an increasing desire among them to imitate men of better habits and life?—Let us look well to this matter brethren,—Let us consider the spiritual interest of the thousands by whom we are surrounded. Their immense numbers gave consequence to our political character; and caused us to be brought among the nations of the earth, Let us not then forget their souls; for if God appears among them with the natural advantages they possess, may we not be in danger, in future years, of becoming extinct, and they take our place; yet we could have no objection to it, if it was according to the plan of the gospel.

The time has arrived when Liberia should show to the gazing world that she has her real character before her eyes—viz: a missionary nation. Think what you will, fellow citizens, God's designs are apparent in the peculiar situation we occupy in the world, and on this barbarous coast. Let the church pray mightily to God to send laborers into his vineyard, their need is particularly remarkable and why is this? why this state of things?—Is it, that all refuse to go among their brethren in heathen darkness? Is it because none cares for the soul of the native, that so little comparatively is done for him? We report to the world that there are from eighty to one hundred thousand native inhabitants in Liberia, which is a fact, with another hundred thousand added; yet I inquire if there is one missionary to a thousand directly laboring among them? and here, I hope, I shall not be impugned if I express my opinion to the world, that I do not think every man a missionary that hails to be such in Liberia, any more than I would a minister of the gospel in the city of Boston or New York, or any other city in the United States or Europe, where the inhabitants adhere to the ordinances of the Christian church; and is not this the position of the greatest part of the preachers in Liberia of all denomination? I omit none all prehaps may see that more can be done and should be done; but who of them will go into the interior, and in form lines of operations, West and East North or South, the whole length and breath of Liberia.

Does any one excuse himself by saying I have too large a family"? To such I say, Take them all with you and teach them to be missionaries Let those that can teach the alphabet do that;—those that can teach the word of God do that; and you yourself preach the word which is the "power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." Sow the seed, it be only a mustard seed it will become something in the future

Does another excuse himself, by saying, I have large possessions to attend to,—which require my presence? Dear brother, give them up if need be for Christ, He that loseth his life for Christ's sake—the same shall save it; and he that endeavors to save his life, by neglecting his duty, the same shall lose it.

Now, Mr. Herald, I close by saying that if this work, is to be accomplished, the command of the Savior is to be adhered to, as closely as the circumstances of the country will allow. He that regards wife, children, parents, houses lands and goods more than souls, has no meetness in the gospel manor. Great sacrifices are to be made for the redemption of Africa, even life itself is to be lost—yet not lost for the promise is, we shall find it again if lost in a noble a cause. Let us dear brethren take hold of this work in a determined manner,—and have faith in God—faith which laughs at impossibilities, and cries it must be done; then God will bless, then will we hasten the day—glorious, long expected day,—when the prophetic declarations shall be verified. Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands unto God." "FROM BEYOND THE RIVERS OF ETHIOPIA MY SUPPLIANTS, EVEN THE DAUGHTER OF MY DISPERSED SHALL BRING MY OFFERING."—Zeph: III—10.

AGRICULTURE.

THE TIME has evidently come, when the agricultural interest of Liberia should excite greater attention among our people than it has hitherto done; as upon its progress and improvement depend our independence and prosperity as a nation. There is no branch of industry for the successful pursuit of which Liberia is more adapted than this; and yet strange to say, there is none for which there is apparently less taste.

There seems to be among our people a great propensity for trade. Every body seems desirous of being a merchant; but this is plainly unreasonable: it cannot be. Industry, as an element of national prosperity, must be pursued in its various branches. The feet must not strive for the place of the hand, nor the ear for the place of the nose; otherwise the efficiency of the body will be destroyed, and the most disastrous consequences ensue. Each should perform its own function in its proper place; thus the general end will be attained—the good of the whole will be promoted. But it not unfrequently occurs, that, among a people, owing to their peculiar circumstances the foot can be used with more advantage than the hand, and the ear can be rendered more lucrative than the nose; what under such circumstances, is the duty of that people? Certainly to use those members which are productive of the greater amount of benefit, without neglecting to give proper exercise to the others; in other words, it is the duty of peoples as of individuals primarily to use and improve the means which are within their reach, and then, if there be time and opportunity, pursue those things which require the putting forth of extraordinary effort for their attainment.

Now it is unquestionably true as we intimated above, that Liberia is far more adapted to agricultural than commercial pursuits, the physical character of the country seems to favor the one, and discourage the other. Nature holds out inducements, and seems anxious to crown with success our agricultural efforts, while she appears to regard with unpropitious eye our commercial attempts. Obstructions the most insuperable stand in the way of our advancement in commercial importance; while the facilities for progress in agricultural greatness and independence present themselves on every hand. Reports that from time to time, reach us from the interior tend to the confirmation of this truth; it were therefore wisdom in us as a people, to avail ourselves of these advantages, to apply ourselves more sedulously to these pursuits which will tend to the promotion of our prosperity and happiness.

The reason why our people have not engaged more generally in the labors of husbandry, is owing we believe, to the fact that the greater portion of Liberia is maritime. We do not see the rural beauty and richness of the country; it is only the borders of Africa that we behold. When settlements are made in the interior, and the people witness the fecundity of the soil there, and discover the internal resources of the country, it will be a difficult matter to restrain them from entering upon the pursuit of agriculture. The sickly and unprofitable trade with the natives, which now attracts the attention of so many, will cease to charm, and the bold energetic and industrious husband-man, will take the place of the imbecile and indolent trader.

Agriculture has always been the in-exhaustible and unfailing source of a nation's welfare, and of private comfort and happiness. It is this that has raised the United States to the exalted position, in point of interior independence, which they now occupy; and now that they stand on a level with the most favored nations, while every art and science are cultivated, that of agriculture is by no means neglected There are many in the pursuit of it; and it is this that imparts that attractiveness to those shores which draws thither all the nations of the earth, The development of the natural resources of a country gives life and permanancy to all branches of industry. A conviction of this fact, we are gratified to record, is becoming more lively and general in Liberia; and the scene to be witnessed in various part of our agricultural districts is truly interesting and encouraging. This augurs favorably for the future of Liberia.

Peace and plenty, comfort and happiness, civilization and Christianity, will be spread over this land, "as far as our influence extends," by our advancement in agriculture.

DREADFUL MASSACRE OF BRITISH TROOPS.

We learn that extraordinary excitement prevailed at Sierra Leone, in the latter part of last month, in consequence of the disastrous results of an expedition hastily and inadequately gotten up, by the Acting Governor, "for the enforcement of payment by Bambaa Mimah Lahi the chief of that country, of certain indemnities to Sierra Leone merchants in that river, "for losses sustained by them through that chief in "the latter part of last year."

Owing to the numerical superiority of the natives the troops from Sierra Leone were compelled to retreat before them; several having been killed and wounded. It is to be hoped that the authorities will not consider the matter as "settled," until they shall have humbled the natives, and maintained the honor and dignity of the government; for if this matter be dropped in statu quo it will unquestionably produce an unfavorable effect, and may be the antecedent of a series of evil consequences, affecting not only Sierra Leone, but other settlements on this part of the coast. An account of the full particulars as given by the "New Era," may be found on another page.

EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

BY the British Mail Steamer, of the present month, we have intelligence to the 23rd of June. The most interesting news from the seat of War, is with reference to the operations of the Allies in the Sea of Azoff where several remarkable successes had been gained, by the flotilla of the allied fleets, They had captured several important Russian, strongholds, among which are Yenikale.—Kertch and the height of Tchernava; as these places were to a great extent, destitute of naval protection, they were captured with comparative little effort and without the effusion of blood. The Russians who occupied them, burnt their effects and fled before the Allies. It is said that these victories are important and will render the overthrow of Sebastopol far easier. It was by means of the places captured that supplies were conveyed thither. In four days the Russians lost altogether an immense quantity of provisions four war steamers, and 240 sail vessels employed exclusively in provisioning the troops at Sebastopol,

Alluding to the conques ts in the Sea of Azoff, an Austrian paper says;—

"The conquest of Kertch and Yenikale is perhaps more important than the occupation of Perekop would be. It was long thought, but erroneously, that the Russians received all their reinforcements by the isthmus of Perekop, and it is only during the progress of the campaign in the Crimea that the Allies have discovered that the Emperor Nicholas had caused bridge to be constructed over the Palus Meotis by means of which the Russian army received the greater number of its reinforcement and its supplies of provisions. When masters of the Sea of Azoff, the allied vessels will without difficulty be able to destroy these bridges which connect the fetid lagoons of the Guilje More; The consequences of that conquest will soon be felt by the Russians, It is more particularly the cavalry concentrated in the Crimea that will be the first to suffer. Their number is estimated at 40, 000, exclusively of the horses of the artillery. The quantity of forage required for so large a number of horses was drawn almost exclusively from the South —eastern part of Russia. The closing of this road will soon compel the Russians to reduce the force of their cavalry which now gives them so great an advantage over the Allies"

THE BALTIC—MASSACRE OF BRITISH SEAMEN BY RUSSIANS —Fresh cause of indignation on the part of the English against the Russians has been created by the barbarous treatment, received by a British crew composed of twenty men ,in a Russian port in the Baltic, while in the act of landing, under flag of truce, from one of H. B. M. Ships. certain Fins, who had been taken prisoners in order to give them their liberty. The Emperor of Russia is called upon either to "visit with awful retribution the ruffians who perpetrated it," or to bear the stigma of being an accomplice in the atrocious act. The London News gives the following account of the Massacre;

"Actuated by motives of humanity, Admiral Dundas directed Capt Fanshawe to land the poor inoffensive prisoners taken by the Cossack—in other words give them liberty, and show that it is not with wrote hed fishermen that England makes war. To effect this, Capt Fanshawe was compelled to have recourse to a flag of truce that sacred signal which all honorable nations treat with respect. The prisoners were put on shore, and their baggage was landed, the white flag flying conspicuously, all the time. At this stage some three hundred brigands made their appearance The person who headed this band could speak English out in reply to the statements of the officer in command of our countrymen, and of the prisoners who had been landed, the chief of the brigands said that he did "not care in the least for a flag of truce, but would show him how Russians can fight," In exemplifying the Russian mode of fighting, he immediately gave his men order to massacre, not only the British sailors on the jetty but the Fins they had landed; and to complete the bloody work, he dragged the wounded from the boat, and bayoneted them on the jetty. One man wounded in two places, alone survived to tell the tale"

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE.

From the United States we have very little that is new or interesting. The same go ahead spirit prevails—fillibustering propensities still exist. Several parties charged with enlisting recruits within the United States for the purpose of serving in the war in the Crimea had been examined before the United States, Commissioners Court. Three persons had also been examined in the same court, charged with fitting out a brig at the port of New York, for the purpose of the African slave trade. This case was adjourned, on the parties finding bail to a large amount.

THE KNOW NOTHINGS—A grand Know-Nothing convention was to be held at Philadephia on the 6th of June. The Democratic party were making a great struggle to cope with the Know-Nothings, and their organs boast that a considerable reaction is now visible. A municipal election at Washington had resulted in favor of the Know-Nothings by only a small majority. At Norwich and New Haven, the Democratic candidates for city offices were chosen by handsome majorities. Only three weeks before, the Know-Nothings had carried Norwich by 300 majority. On the 4th of June they were beaten by 200 votes. The Know Nothing State Convention at Bango (Maine) had adjourned after passing strong anti slavery resolutions, with only three dissenting (votes, and appointing delegates to the National council at Philadelphia.

MASSACHUSETTS—A bill nullifying the Fugitive Slave Law passed to a third reading in the Massachusetts Senate on the 10th of May.

NEW ORLEANS—The cholera was raging as an epidemic in New Orleans, and the Board of Health of the city had made a public declaration of the melancholy fact. A correspondent of the New Orleans Delta, writing from Tampico under date of April 30th, says that the commercial relations between the United States and Mexico are far from satisfactory to the Americans, and that the United States Minister, the Hon: James Gadsden, has protested to the prime Minister of Santa Anna against the numerous special concessions which Santa Anna has granted to certain European houses for the introduction of seven or eight cargoes of foreign dry goods on the Pacific coast, at thirty per cent less than the rates of the established tariff.

KANSAS—The election held to fill vacancies in the Legislature for Kansas, had resulted in favor of the pro-slavery candidate.

CALIFORNIA—The question of dividing the present territory of California, into three distinct States—to be called California, Colorado, and Shaston—has been discussed in the Legislature. It was stated, that, if the secesion were accomplished, the introduction of Slavery would not be allowed.

WAR IN SOUTH AMERICA—VENEZUELA AND NEW GRENADA.—Intelligence from Venezuela to May 1st states, that President Monagas had sent a message to Congress complaining of hostile measurs adopted by the Government of New Grenada in extending its jurisdiction over Venezuelan territory, or, at least, over territory in dispute between the two Republics, and Congress had invested the President with dictatorial powers, authorizing him to raise an army of 60,000 men, call out the national militia, and negotiate a loan of 4,000,000 dollars to carry on a war against New Grenada.

NOTICE.

The Citizens of Monrovia are hereby informed that a new effort is about to be made, for the promotion of good morals and religion among the natives in and about our city. Every Sunday at half past two O'clock, religious instruction will be imparted to such natives as may attend, at the Chapel erected for their benefit at Kroo town. All persons wishing well to the cause of African civilization, and Christianization; and desiring the welfare of the heathen around us, are requested to send their native Children and youths regularly. This effort we hope will be the means of securing a better observance of the Lord's day among the natives as well as of increasing their knowledge of the "Common Salvation" purchased for them by Jesus Christ, May the lord help us, as a Christian community, to do our duty with respect to our heathen neighbours. H. B. M.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr, Herald

Nowthat the election is over, we are all quietly engaged in our variousvocations; and when we have nothing else to do, take up a sheet of the Liberia Sentinel to amuse ourselves. You will no doubt be astonished to hear us say that we find amusement in the "Sentinel"—a paper perfectly ridiculous and contemptible; but sir we amuse ourselves at the idea of the Sentinel proposing to bring about a political reformation by resorting to the most abominable means that could be adopted viz falsehood and deception; and where these have failed to accomplish the end, to descend to the lowest abuse speaking lightly of dignitaries and charging all True Liberians, with being prompted by the most unworthy motives to them many disinterested acts of patriotism which they have performed for Liberia's weal. These things are truly to be lamented on account of their demoralizing and seditious tendency and should not be lightly regarded; still we feel amused at them, because they serve to reveal the character of the authors, and to guard us against them. We know full well that the "Sentinel" looks upon us as being exceedingly ignorant poor and dependent which we are perfectly willing, he should do, as it by no means raises him in the estimation of others. We are Bassa men and know what we like best, and care not whether the "Sentinel" likes it or not, we have nothing to do with him, more than to pay him one dollar per annum, which, as a matter of course, we paid in advance; and having done this we hold ourselves under no further obligation to him, The people of Sinoe generally like the people of Bassa are poor &c &c no quotation marks are necessary, your readers or the readers of the Sentinel know the allusion, still they are industrious and true to their country, and never have been and never will be bribed. We have concluded as you percieved by the returns of the election to send our son S. A. Benson to preside over the affairs of the Government the next two years, don't trouble him.

GRAND BASSA COUNTY.

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald

I have noticed for some months several articles over the name of that very excellent gentlemen Rev F Burns and feel truly gratified to find him engaged in so laudable a work as that of attempting a moral reformation in Liberia by setting forth clearly and distinctly the many evils, consequent upon certain practices which have obtained too fast a hold upon some in our growing republic, and which if continued must exert a most baneful influence upon the rising generation.

Every careful observer must have long since noticed the rapid progress which extravagance is making in our communties and the little effort which is made to cultivate the minds and morals of our youths, than which, nothing is more important to the growth of our glorious Repnblic. What Mr Herald are the embellishments of our persons or our houses if our minds and the minds of our children are left uncultivated? Let Liberians think soberly on these matters, lay aside every superfluity and bend their energies to elevate their children's intellectual and moral character.

Let our children be taught to work, and not to spend their precious time in idle sport. Let young men know that fine dress will not constitute them good husdands, wise statemen or any thing else that is truly useful.

Let young women know that, silks, artificials and ribbands will never make them efficient wives or good mothers.

And while I hope the Rev, Gentlemen will continue to write, I hope also that his readers will give attention to his excellent advices.

Yours

AT BASSA

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr Herald:

Perhaps your readers often wonder why they hear so little from Edina in the County of Grand Bassa, and are ready to ask whether or not the place has entirely gone down, to which we reply for their information that the place stands as prominent as any in the county and is as prosperous as any, every thing considered. Then why it may be asked do we hear so little about it? We answer because we choose to mind our own business, and have but little to do with the business of others. We prefer being engaged as Farmers Merchants & Mechanics attending to the education of our children and leave the rest of Liberia to enjoy themselves in festivals and other mirthful pleasures, which are so well adapted to bring them into notoriety. Again it may be asked, are the people more industrious and moral than those of other places? We answer no, but will compare favorably with any other, and in intelligence, the number of inhabitants considered cannot be excelled.

Edina is a fine thriving village and though not favored with many emigrants owing to the settlement of Buchanan, has made considerable improvements and promises to be one of the principal towns in the County.

We cordially invite the attention of New Comers to this place as being decidedly the most healthy in the County and offering as great facilities for a living as any other. We only need more men of industry and enterprize to make the place what it should be.

BASSA MAN.

A RUSSIAN PICTURE OF SEBASTOPOL—In spite of all the efforts which the enemy have made, our bulwarks stand as fast as ever. Long before the bombardment began, the journals of the West informed us that our walls and forts were speedily to be put to a new proof. This made us redouble our precautions, and we bore firmly the truly murderous (hollische) fire which threatened all with destruction. Nevertheless, thousands were devoted to death, and it made one shudder to see the Elborus (the steam-boat) pass every two hours, during the bombardment, from the south to the north, with so many wounded that she could scarcely carry them. While standing in Bastion No. 4 exposed in admiration of the cool and stoical conduct of our sailors. They fell and expired without a cry; though racked by the most fearful agonies. The southern side of our town has suffered most severely, and is scarcely to be recognised again. Five hundred houses have been totally destroyed, and grass is growing on their ruins. The beautiful theatre no longer exists. Though the upper districts of the town are not so much damaged, yet there is not a single house to be seen which does not bear manifest traces of the bombardment. The streets are everywhere rooted up by shot, and the pavement is totally destroyed, while at every corner stand whole pyramids of the enemy's cannon balls, and exploded shells, which were daily collected before the opening of the fire. In many streets five or six such pyramids are to be seen, each of them from eight to ten feet high. Nevertheless, business is continued, and booths are opened for the sale of goods Prices, however are enormously raised, and sugar costs one silver rouble (2s) per lb The supply of meat is more than abundant, but bread is exceedingly scarce. The streets are filled with people and crowded children run to and fro, assisting at the construction of barricades, and pelting each other with balls of clay. Our life in Sebastopol is unintelligable to us, for use is a second nature. The greatest accomodation prevail in the harbour of Ekaterin, where cannon-balls, powder, fascines, sacks and provisions are landed in astounding quantities, as they are forwarded from the north to the forts. In a word, neither the thunder of the enemy's cannon nor the siege of Sebastopol has suffered to disturb us any longe; we may look over our adversaries, who are shedding their blood without result before our brazen walls. We read many absurb statements about the condition of the besieged; but the absurdest of all is, no doubtedly, the news that we suffer from want of supplies, and that hundreds of us are daily cut off by death—of all which we have seen to be seen

POETRY.

AFRICA'S CRUELTIES, MOURNED OVER.

Africa thy sons in ages pass'd and gone,
Snatched from thy breast, and used like men (forlorn;)
Into a slave ship thrown, and borne away,
Without consent!—without one word to say;—
Low panting under deck, in painful sight,
In chains and hand-cuffs, borne to foreign, land,
To toil and languish in the Western sand.
Oh heavens!—dost thou tolerate this act?
Will thou not from this earth thy laws exact?
While roaring thunders burst, and lightnings (flash)
And clouds all hover 'round, while billows dash
The slave-ship, ride the waves and homeward, (peep)
Then mount the heavens, then down in the deep;
At last their wretched eye-sight pierce the (bound)
And then they belch their spoil up on the ground.
No human tongue can tell the pain and grief,
Left on the shores, where such destructions (reach;)
They banish pleasures—banish earthly joy—
Excite the man, and cause him to destroy,
His body:—to prevent the scenes of woe,
Which pain and grief, would on his soul bestow.
Poor soul! he wanders off, and then draws near,
And fain while roaming, would he shed a tear;
In sad dismay, he makes his lasting turn,
And plodding home, an early death to earn,
He penetrates the wilderness around,
In sad despair, he falls upon the ground—
And looking up-ward, bursts into a tear,
As if the great Protector is not near.
He groans his last—and silently he rests
His body, in the monster-jaws of Death.

EXPEDITION TO THE MALLAGHEA

DREADFUL MASACRE OF THE BRITISH TROOPS

From the "New Era"

Some days after the departure of Governor Kennedy from this government, the Acting Governor received a letter from the Chiefs of the Moten country, and from king Stephen of Konkatong, complaining that two of their canoes (loaded with slaves) had been seized in the Sherbro country, by the British Consul, and some of their people killed there, and demanding the surrender of a number of people (also slaves) which they stated had been carried away by us from the Island of Matacong. No satisfaction could be given for the capture of the slaves, inasmuch as the Sherbro treaty with this government empowers us to seize all canoes found with slaves on board. The surrender of Momodoo Yelle, a Foulah who had fled to this country, was also demanded by these chiefs, who stated, that if he was not given up, the king of Foulah would immediately close the roads. This demand was also refused, as we have no treaty to deliver up Foulahs to the Soosoos, even for offences committed in the latter country. The chiefs dissatisfied with the refusal of this government to accede to their demands, peremptorily ordered the British and French traders to leave the river within ten days; after which period they the chiefs would not be responsible for the safety of their goods. Notice of this having been given by our traders to this government, they were instructed to adopt such measures, for the removal of their property, as their own judgment would suggest, in the event of pacific measures failing; and her Majesty's steamer Prometheus arriving at the same time it was deemed advisable to send an armed expedition to enforce our treaties for the protection of our commerce in the rivers; and her Majesty's vessels Dover and Britomart, having also arrived, with the Gambia contingent, in the Cape Coast war, and a formidable force being in the colony, a requisition was made to the government to send these vessels to the Mallagheа. In compliance with which, upward of 450 rank and file, of the 3rd West India Regiment, under the command of Capt. Rookes, of the 2nd West India Regiment, embarked on board the above vessels—the squadron being under the command of Capt. Heseltine. This expedition left this on the 28th November of last year; and having arrived and landed at Mallaghea, Bumbah Mimah Lahi, the chief of that place, proposed that amicable arrangement should be entered into with this government; and an indemnification for the losses of the traders sustained by the removal of their goods, was the sole infliction proposed. The indemnification amounted to 1030 dollars, and was to be paid by the middle of March last. The time having elapsed, and the promised payment not forthcoming, the Acting Governor deemed it advisable to make some enquiries respecting it. Mr. Dillet, his Excellency's Private Secretary, was thereupon directed to proceed to the river for that purpose, and in case of failure of payment to intimate to the chief that the next visit would be a hostile one.

Mr. Dillet left this on the morning of the 19th inst., in her Majesty's steamer Teazer, which had a few days before arrived from England, and returned here on the 21st, failing to carry out his mission; the chief offering to compromise the matter for 300 dollars. On the issue of Mr. Dillet's visit being made known to his Excellency the Acting Governor, the Teazer was directed to return to Mallaghea the same evening, with 150 rank and file of the 1st and 3rd West India Regiments, and Captain Nicolas, of the Teazer, Captain Fletcher, commanding the troops, and Mr. Dillett, as commissioners, on behalf of the government, to demand, and, if necessary enforce payment. On their arrival at Mallaghea, a rocket and shell was thrown over the town; when it was observed from the mast-head that a white flag was hoisted on the chief's flag-staff—it being understood at the previous visit that this signal would show their willingness to continued friendship; but as it afterwards turned out, it was an intimation to the people to quit the town. The Commissioners, on observing the signal, landed under an escort of the troops, and having met several persons on the wharf, they desired them to acquaint the chief that they were prepared to treat with him him on their mission. Some time having elapsed, other messengers were dispatched upon the same errand. In the mean time, the chief's prime minister, Momodoo Touray, came down to the wharf. He was informed that if the the chief did not make his appearance in half an hour, fire would be opened upon the town. At the expiration of that period, the chief not appearing, the flag of truce which was then hoisted on board the Teazer was hauled down, and Memodoo Touray seized as a prisoner of war. The ship immediately opened fire upon the town—the Mosque was in flames, and the fire appearing to extend over the greater part of the town, the troops were safely embarked; having had five men wounded.

It was then resolved to proceed to the mouth of the river, and return the following morning. On returning, the next day, a portion of the town still appeared standing, when it was determined to land the troops and fire the remainder. A man was sent to the mast-head to look out, who reported no sign of the natives in the town, but a considerable number at a distance. An advanced guard having been selected, consisting of 40 persons, under the command of Lieutenant Vincent—Commander Nicolas and Mr. Dillet volunteering to accompany it—they proceeded into the town. They had not gone far into the ruins when a murderous fire was opened upon them, by a numerous and formidable enemy there concealed. Mr. Dillet was wounded, at the first discharge, in the head and leg. The main body soon came up to the support of the leading party when a smart retiring fire was kept up with the enemy till our troops had reached the wharf, where, under cover of the ship's guns, they had partly succeeded in embarking; but the pinnace, with a number of men, on pushing off from the wharf, is said to have been struck by a bullet, and filling with water, the men, from alarm, capsized her. A flag of truce was immediately hoisted from the ship; but the men were barbarously shot at in the water by the enemy on the shore. Lieut. Wylie was among this party, but is supposed to have been drowned. Several of those, who had been capsized, fortunately escaped the deadly fire of the natives on the shore, and swam safely to the ship. To the above melancholy disaster, the severe loss of our troops is said to be principally attributed.

Of the advanced party, but five returned to the ship, Commodore Nicolas, Lieutenant Vincent, and Mr. Dillet; all wounded; and two soldiers, severely wounded in the head. Acting Paymaster Andrews, who had also volunteered, having been killed among the others of the party.

Serjeant Scanland, an Irishman, and formerly of one of the Irish regiments, who was also shot, while leading his company, is said to have behaved nobly, and died beckoning his men on to their duty. The men also behaved well, and were with some difficulty induced to obey the sound for the retreat.

The officers present in this skirmish, were, Capt. Fletcher, commanding; Lieuts. Kerr, and Beazley, 3rd W. I. regt., Lieuts. Strachan and Wylie, 1st. W. I. regt; and Lieut. Vincent, 2nd W. I. regt.; and staff surgeons Marchant, and Bradshaw.

Momodoo Toura was set at liberty, on his promise to obtain the release of our prisoners, and their being sent to Bintey; where the Assistant Surgeon of the Teazer was left, to treat the wounded on their arrival.

The Teazer left Mallaghea, on Wednesday evening, and arrived here on the following morning; and on the same evening was dispatched again to Mallaghea, it is supposed for an exchange of prisoners.

We have been told that a native of the Gambia, who is here, direct from Mallaghea, reports, that subsequent to the departure of H. M. steamer Teazer, the natives searched for the corpses of our soldiers; and that only fifteen were found. They had 7 prisoners, with Mr. Firth; and he had not been injured. This statement, if correct, may lead to the supposition, that a large number of missing soldiers must have met a watery grave, or been swept into the river by the tide, after being killed. This party also reports, that the number of natives killed is awful, and exceeds 400! He attributes this severe loss to a shell, which fell among a number of head warriors and elders, assembled in a council of war in the town, by which they were all killed; and a great number also killed, in a small hamlet, where ammunition was kept, behind Mallaghea, from an explosion of gunpowder, caused by a person trying his gun, the flash from the pan of which caught his powder flask, and was communicated to a number of barrels of powder, by which the whole of the town, with the people in it, were destroyed.

The alarm is said to be very great among the natives at Mallaghea; Bambah Mimah Bahi had sent an express to king Stephen, of the Soom brass, that "the white man done kill all his people;" and craving his assistance. This message is said to have been delivered in the presence of a resident here, who came overland, and arrived here last evening. May 30,

"THY WILL BE DONE."

When sorrow casts its shade around,
And pleasure seems our course to shun;
When nought but grief and care is found,
How sweet to say, "Thy will be done."

When sickness lends its pallid hue,
And every dream of bliss is flown;
When quickly from the fading view,
Recede the joys that once were known.

The soul resigned will still rejoice,
Though life's last sand is nearly run;
With humble faith and trembling voice,
It whispers soft, "Thy will be done.

When called to mourn the early doom
Of one affection held most dear:
While o'er the closing, silent tomb,
The bleeding heart distils the tear;

Though love its tribute sad will pay,
And earthly streams of solace shun;
Still, still the humble soul will say,
In lowly dust, "Thy will be done

Whate'er, O Lord, thou hast designed,
To bring my soul to thee in trust;
If mercies or afflictions kind,
For all thy dealings, Lord, are just.

Take all—but grant in goodness free,
That love which ne'er thy stroke would shun;
Support this heart, and strengthen me
To say in faith, "Thy will be done."

Learn to tread life's dangerous maze,
With unerring virtue's clue;
Envy's censure, flattry,s praise,
With unmoved indifference view.

Void of strong desire and fear,
Life's wide ocean trust no more;
Strive thy little bark to steer,
With the tide, but near the shore;

Thus prepared, thy shortened sail,
Shall, when'er the winds increase
Seizing each propitious gale,
Waft thee to the port of peace.

Keep thy conscience from offence,
And tempestuous passions free,
So, when thou art called from hence,
Easy shall thy passage be.

Easy shall thy passage be.
Cheerful thy allotted stay,
Short the account 'twixt God and thee,
Hope shall meet thee on the way.

Truth shall lead thee to the gate,
Mercy's self shall let thee in,
Where, its never changing state,
Full perfection, shall begin.

THE IMPORTANCE OF MAKING A NOTE.

We don't speak of making a note in music, but of noting down whatever valuable, beautiful, or interesting thought, fact, illustration or anecdote occurs to us in our reading or conversation. Of the saying, "When found make a note of," a writer once said, no less truthfully than quaintly, it is a rule, which should shine in gilt letters on the gingerbread of youth and the spectacle case of age. Every one regrets and suffers who neglects it. There is some trouble in it, to be sure; but in what good thing is there not? Reading and writing men who act upon this rule for any considerable length of time will accumulate a good deal of matter in various forms, shapes, and sizes—some more, some less legible and intelligible—some unposted in old pockets book—some on whole or half sheets, or mere scraps of paper and backs of letters—some lost sight of and forgotten, stuffing out of old portfolios, or getting smokeing edges in bundles tied up with faded tape or antiquated twine. No doubt there are countless boxes, and drawers, and pigeonholes of such things which want looking into, and would well repay the trouble. Nay, we are sure the proprietors would find themselves much benefitted by now and then looking over their own collections.—How many important facts, how many striking and beautiful thoughts, how many quaint or apposite illustrations—that have occurred to us—have escaped away because we made no "note" of them as an invitation to stay with us. We say to all our literary friends, "When found make a note of."

DAYS WITHOUT NIGHTS.

Dr. Baird, in a lecture delivered recently in Cincinnati, said:—

There is nothing that strikes a stranger more forcibly, if he visits Sweden at the season of the year when the days are the longest, than absence of the night. He arrived at Stockholm from Cottonburgo, 400 miles distant, in the morning, and in the afternoon went to see some friends—had not taken note of time—and returned about midnight; it was as light as it is here half an hour after sundown. You could see distinctly. But all was quiet in the street; it seemed as if the inhabitants were gone away or were dead. No signs of life—stores closed.

The sun goes down at Stockholm a little before ten o'clock. There is great illumination all night as the sun passes round the earth towards the north pole, the refraction of its rays is such that you see to read at midnight. Dr. Baird read a letter in the forest near Stockholm at midnight without artificial light. There is a mountain at the Bothnir, where, on the 31st of June, the sun does not go down at all. Travellers go there to see it. A steamboat goes out from Stockholm for the purpose of carrying those who are curious to witness the phenomenon. It occurs only one night. The sun goes down the horizon, you can see the whole face of it, and in five minutes it begins to rise.

Birds and animals take their accustomed rest at the usual hours. The hens take to the trees about seven o'clock, P. M., and stay there until the sun is well up in the morning, and the people get into the habit of rising late too.

BUSINESS FIRST, THEN PLEASURE.—A man who is very rich now was very poor when he was a boy. When asked how he got his riches, he replied: "My father taught me never to play until my work for the day was finished, and never spend my money until I had earned it. If I had but half an hour's work to do on a day I must do that the first thing, and in an half and hour. After this was done, I was allowed to play; and I could then play with much more pleasure than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind. I early formed a habit of doing everything in its time, and it soon became perfectly easy to do so. It is to this habit that I now owe my present prosperity. Let every boy who reads this, go and do likewise, and he will meet with a similar reward.—Wright's Casket.

Fancy names of States—New York is called the Empire State; Connecticut the Freestone State, and sometimes the land of Wooden Nutmegs; Massachusetts, the Bay State; Vermont the Green Mountain State; New—Hamshire, the Granite State; Pennsylvania, the Keystone State; Virginia, the Old Dominion; Delaware, the Diamond State; North Carolina the Old North State; Louisiana, the Creole State; Texas, the Lone Star State; Mississipi, the Bayou State; California, the El Dorado State. The inhabitants of Ohio are called Buck-eyes; of Iowa, Hawk-eyes; of Illinois, Suckers; of Indiana Hoosiers; of Michigan, wolverines; of Wisconsin Badgers.—New York Sunday Times.

STATES AND TERRITORIES.—There are at this time thirty one States in the Union, and seven Territories. The States are as follows:—Main, New Hamshire, Vermount, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut; New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania; Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississipi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Michigan Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin and California. The Territories are as follows: Oregon, Minesota, Utah, New Mexico, Washington, Kansas, and Nebraska, These cover enough space to make as many additional states as we already have and such will in the course of time be the result,—Presbyterian.

NOTICE.

The Citizens of Monrovia are hereby informed that a new effort is about to be made, for the promotion of good morals and religion among the natives in and about our city. Every Sunday at half past two O'clock, religious instruction will be imparted to such natives as may attend, at the Chapel erected for their benefit in Kroo town. All persons wishing well to the cause of African civilization, and Christianization; and desiring the welfare of the heathen around us, are requested to send their native Children and youths regularly. This effort we hope will be the means of securing a better observance of the Lord's day among the natives as well as of increasing their knowledge of the "Common Salvation" purchased for them by Jesus Christ, May the lord help us, as a Christian community, to do our duty with respect to our heathen neighbours. LIBERIA HERALD.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT ROBERTSPORT ON THE 26th OF JULY BY C S. SNETTER.

Fellow Citizens,:—

I return you my most sincere and hearty thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me in choosing me your unworthy servant this day to fill such an important position as this And I only regret my inability to perform this important task,—a task that deserves the anguage of a Demosthenes, a Cesar, o Cicero, yea if all the knowledge of Egypt, Europe, and America, were centered in one small circle and treasured up in the mind of your unworthy speaker, language would then be almost inadequate to such a glorious occasion. Fellow Citizens—while we commemorate this day of the Independence of our common country, let us for a moment reflect and not forget to return our sincere thanks to Almighty, God, who has been so kind as to preserve us and our country, from the time of its commencement to the present

Fellow Citizens—The period has now arrived when it is almost universally agreed that all men are born free and equal, according to the commandments of God. By the unfortunate fall of our fore parents Adam, and Eve, by disobedience to God, they were driven out of their land of peace and joy, since when generation after generation has existed only by their labour, which perhaps was ordered all for the best, even for our infant home the Republic of Liberia; and from all appearence it seemed that this misfortune went from generation down to generation But after christianity commenced its operation sending its light from one generation to another, people became more and more enlightened, and the people of England had begun to apprehend and exercise their rights and privileges, free subjects became depressed—they fled to a place where they might be received as men of free and equal rights, so likewise our fathers. On account of American oppression, and persecution in the year 1819, came to this country; and down to the present, the kind providence of almighty God by which our infant Republic has been led in the time of her darkness has protected her in all her danger, sustained her in time of her weakness provided for wants and stood by us until he has raised us from a small and favorable begining to be a free and an independant nation. Let us fellow citizens reflect and contemplate upon those patriots who now lie in yonder grave-yard; they strugled and strove to lay the foundation of this Republic whose Independence we this day celebrate and call our own. yea let us sympathize with those heroes who felt the pain of death in defence of their country's rights and also for the declaration of our Independence; how they toiled how they endured the many hardships and deprivations of revolution, how they fought and bled on this very spot as it were consecrated to liberty by their sweat and blood w battles for victory—And now the blessed fruit of heavens freedom and prosperity has this day enabled us to proclaim with a loud voice that Liberia is a free soverign and an Independant Nation. Fellow citizens, of our beloved country Liberia is advancing let us hope that the fear of Heaven which expels all other fears and that regard to our religious duty which will transcend all others may influence our public men and the private citizens of this Republic that it may bear our country; Liberia still onward in her happy carreer until she realize our gratifying anticipation, and will ever look forward to the close of this century and may the true patriots of Liberia her sons and her daughters and our brethren now in the land of captivity see as we now apprehend—see the lone star floating on the gentle breeze of freedom flying on the top of our capital and may it compel them to unite with us with all gigantic power proclaiming with a loud voice as the sons and daughters of Liberia: Liberia my happy home, once in darkness but now a free and independent nation.

Let us then Fellow citizens—while we celebrate this day of the anniversary of our Independence—let us this moment not forget or pass over the names of the patriots and defenders of our country viz a Lott Cary—E. Johnson—C. Brander–Hollinger–Hawkins–N. Brander–Shaw Newport–Lawrence–C. Butler–Teage &-Bone dict and those who silently slumber in yonders grave yard—where are those brave Liberians? I trust resting with God the father in Heaven When I cast my eyes over this assembly I beheld their seats vacated in a manner and filled with strange faces and by their offsprings, I ask again where are those patriots? No answer can be given but the voice from the altar now answer in a melancholy tone we are their substitutes who loved their country—those are they who suffered under the oppression of the yoke in chains for liberty and thanks be to a kind Providence we now reap the benefits of their agony and long toiled sufferings to lay this foundation for us; then let their memories be eternally embalmed in our bosom and let our children praise them The day has dawn; the time will soon come when the consequences of Liberia's independence will reach the extremities of Africa's shore—yea from east to west and from north to south then the shining blue field and the lone star of freedom will stretch forth her arms bear off oppressions yoke from our colored brethren and introduce liberty and peace in their breast —The clamor of war in Africa will then cease; the lone star will ascend and ascend and continue to ascend until the viny tree of Liberty bearing its rays will shoot its top up to the sun and its boughs hang over all Africa and our weak and wearied brethren will sit down under its shades to rest—while the lone star floats the gentle breeze with all the brilliance the freedom of Liberia, a free and Independent Nation.

Let every volunteer this day with affectionate gratitude; every one in whose breast shall rise an aspiration for human rights and the Countrys liberty out pour this day republican feelings which will prove our sentiments to be just and natural and let the cities and villages the public temples and the family circles among all ages and sex; yea I say let glad voices to day be heard speaking in grateful hearts and refreshen our recollection of the fore fathers and virtues and our country. At the dawn of day this morning when the "echo," of the cannon was heard from the Battery of Port Roberts—it awakened Liberia's sons from their sound slumbers who awoke with free songs in their mouths praising God and giving thanks to him for his kindness step to the window of their chamber—the shutters fly open and martial strains fill their ears while they cast their eyes aloft and behold the lone star and the stripes with all their spangled beauty floating on the mornings breeze while Liberia's sons and daughters are seen flocking around it and proclaiming with glad voices and saying Hail; star of "Liberia,' this day thou floatest above our heads letting the world know that this day Liberia's sons and daughters are free, Here stands an asylum for the distressed and persecuted of our race—The vast temple of freedom arises majestically and founded on a Rock it will remain unshaken by the force of Tyrants—a nation undiminished by the flight of time long streams of light emanating from her shall chase the darkness from the benighted shores of Africa—may her virtue swell into Heavens above every tempest; and the pillar of divine glory descending from God will rest forever on the remembrance of freemen, then when our bodies lie down to rest in our dusty graves our names shall be enrolled on the imperishable annals of men and while the lone star adorns the signature of Liberias down trodden sons lying in peace in their silent garves then our flag will still be respected by every nation let us comprehend our sublime relation to time and eternity, to God and to man to be the most precious hope; the most solemn obligations and the highest happiness of man. Liberias Independence must be a source of power and wisdom granted by God himself; be it then the duty of Liberians to speak to write to act in the cause of christianity, patriotism justice, humanity virtue and truth and let Liberias eloquence be the personification of truth virtue and love towards her citizens—and for Liberias Independence and for the existence of our government let us shun those which tend to her subversion—and cultivate those virtues which will render her permanent and maintain it in full vigor to all succeeding ages—Let not the haggard form of intemperance and vanity ever lift up their destroying visage in this happy and, let economy—frugality moderation and Justice at home and abroad mark the character of all our citizens—and let it be our constant care to diffuse knowledge and goodness through all ranks of society. Then will the citizens of Liberia will never be uneasy under our present form of government provided we have sufficient information to judge of its excelency—few nations. Will any of us in our present situation and formation of our government shudder at the thought of subverting our political constitution or suffering it to degenerate into aristocracy or monarchy, I will answer in the affirmative. Yes !!!

Then let a sense of our happy situation produce gratitude to a kind providence; let us consider him the author of all our blessings; acknowledge him our beneficent parent protector and friend. May the predominant tendency of his providence towards us as a nation evince his benevolent designs—then let us open our ear to his call let us attend and improve those intellectual faculties with which God has endowed us in common with other men. Then we the citizens of Liberia this day may celebrate the anniversary of our independence with voices of freedom and liberty; and while we unfurl the lone star to the gentle breeze the sons and daughters can rejoice that they have overcome all their trials and persecution from other nations. This day while the lone star floats on yonder lofty staff and unfurls to the gentle breeza the spangled beauty of its stripes amid the golden blaze of freedom the pleasing daughters and sons of Liberia may shout with glory and honour with out—stretched arms around the altar of God returning thanks for his kindness exclaiming with the poet and calling upon his exile sons to—"Come and sing the elevation

"Of a people once despised
"Now an independent nation
"Having just begun to rise
"Come and see the lone star flying
"All around you look and see
"Come and hear the youths replying
"We are free we are free.

Therefore we the people of Liberia in Africa do acknowledge the gift of God with devout gratitude who granted to us the blessings of the Christian religion.

From time to time our number has increased by migration from the United States of America; our population increased our commerse also has increased; now the Flags of all nations float in our harbour; an honourable trade is carried on exchanging the commodities of our country for another—thus far our highest hopes have been realized—and now all the nations of christendom are looking on our experiment and are bidding us God speed; let Liberia sustain at the same time the highest credit at home and abroad, Our government is of the most popular kind the sovereignty is vested in the people, who by their suffrage enact wholesome laws and enforce obedience and granting to its citizens freedom of sentiments—Let us fellow citizens lift up our oblations to heaven for the better. let us trust in that gracious Being who has hitherto upheld us as it were in the hollow of his hand; let us trust to virtue and the intelligence of our citizens and the efficacy of religion. Oh there, is an hour coming when one whisper of an approving mind, one smile from an approving God, will be counted of more value than the wealth of a thousand worlds like this, in that hour my friends nothing will sustain you but the consciousness of having been governed through life by worthy and good principles.

LIBERIAHERALD
MONROVIA AUGUST 9, 1855

TWENTY SIX TH OF JULY.

The 26th ultimo, the eighth anniversary of Liberian Independence, was observed with the usual demonstrations throughout the Republic. In our city, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, there was an unusual manifestation of life and spirit. The flags of various nations were seen floating in different directions; while strains of martial music, and the booming of cannon throughout the day seemed to heighten the enjoyment.

About 12 o'clock, a large number of persons of both sexes and all ages, collected at the M. E Church, where appropriate exercises were performed. The Oration, delivered by Rev Alexander Crummell, was all it was expected to be—a rich intellectual feast. Some, perhaps a majority of the audience, may have had to "struggle" occasionally "in a net of ratiocination," but all were doubtless entertained and edified. The singing, conducted by Rev A. Herring, is said by those qualified to judge to have been good; with the exception that the tunes might, without any impropriety, have been a little more patriotic. The Declaration of Independence was read by R. L. Stryker Esqr.

We call the attention of our readers to the communication of Hon D. B. Warner. It is interesting as pointing out some important facts relative to the real pecuniary advantages which seeme to us, from our intercourse with foreign traders; and as exhibiting the unjustness of the complaints in which many of them so often indulge.

Not satisfied with the numerous privileges they enjoy in their commerce with the natives within our jurisdiction; being placed on an equal footing, in that respect, with Liberian merchants; and notcontent with the enormous profits which, owing to the inability of our merchants to compete with them, they reap from that source only. they are continually finding fault, and harping, with bombastic air, upon the obligations under which (as they allege) we are placed to them, on account of the assistance they render to the Goverament, by the customary dues they pay into the treasury; intimating, no doubt, that their privileges, already, (as some contend) too many, should be increased.

The true state of the case has been very ably pointed out by our correspondent, whose talents and opportunities for observation, qualify him in an eminent degree to judge of the subject on which he has written. From his statements which are doubtless correct, we perceive that the greater dependeney is on the part of the traders to our coast; and a conviction of this fact is fastening noap the minds of our intelligent merchants so that the question, whether foreigners between whose governments and ours no treaty stipulations exist, should enjoy the same privileges that are extended to the subjects of those Powers who have recognized and made treaties with Liberia, is exciting considerable attention among them.

We hope that the arguments of our correspondent if fallacious will be refuted; if not, we trust they will put a stop to the empty bombastry of those foreign traders who would make the ignorant believe that they are the principal props of Liberia, by their frequent invidious allusions to the indispensability of their residence among us, or their intercourse with us, to the existence of the Government,—allusions. however, which, while they may mislead the uninformed, serve only to illustrate to intelligent minds Æsop's fable of the "gnat on the bull's horn."

DONATIONS OF BOOKS.

While it would be risible vanity in us to flatter ourselves with the opinion that the world is very much concerned about us as a nation, yet from the evidences which from time to time we receive from different quarters, we are led to conclude that there are hearts abroad which beat warmly for our welfare. Among the numerous testimonials of sympathy an regard which we received from our friends in foreign lands are frequent donations to our public libraries, of valuable books; evincing the interest felt in our intellectual and moral advancement. Sir Horace St Paul of England, Benjamin Coates Esqr of Philadelphia and T. R. Hazard Esqr of Rhode Island are among our most liberal benefactors in this respect.

We have noticed several fine books, presented by these gentlemen, in the libraries at the Government House, and at the Representative Hall; for which we take the liberty to present to them, what we conceive they are entitled to, and which we hope they will accept, the thanks of a grateful community.

Notice to Subscribers.

Our subscribers at the leeward counties will much oblige us, if they will for ward their sub scriptions now due, by the earliest opportunity.

A Liberian Book—We learn that a small volume of poetry, by Mr R. H. Gibson, now in press at the Sentinel Office will be out in a few days. Success to Liberian literature.

Drowned—On the 27th ult, two men belonging to the "Government Schooner Lark" while attempting to get on board during very stormy weather, their boat having upset, found, not far from the shore, a watery grave. Their bodies have not been discovered.

Robertsport—We learn that the 26th of July was observed with great spirit and vivacity at the new settlement at Cape Mount, A letter written to a friend of ours states; "Mr Snetter delivered the address for us; after which the mountains in our vicinity resounded with the echo of cannon from the battery of Port Roberts. Not being able to have a "Tea" in consequence of the absence of the "fair sex," the pleasures of the day ended with a well spread and sumptuous table, after which we returned to our duty—watching."

At Bassa Addresses were delivered on the 26th by H. M. West Esqr at Buchanan, and Hon M. A. Rand at Edina.

Burglary—We learn that a few evenings ago some "consummate rascal" broke into the store of Hon. E. J. Roye—and stole (cash) money to the amount of one hundred and seventy dollars. We hope the rogue will be apprehended, and brought to justice.

From our Bassa Corespondent.

His majesty king Boeflaw of the Grand Bassa county is now in the hands of the sheriff for safe keeping until his majesty shall have made restitution for his depredations on Topraneo (a native chieftian inhabiting the same section of country, in defiance of the laws, peace and dignity of this Republic.

His imprisonment commenced a fort night ago, since which time he has managed through the activity of his friends to liquidate the amount of two hundred dollars he was required to reimburse Topraneo; and they are now making strenuous efforts to satisfy the demands of the government for a similar amount.

The cause of the outrage appeared to have originated from an alleged violation on the part of Topraneo of the devil law, for which Boeflaw assumed the prerogative to chastise him. this was urged as a plea of justification by his majesty, and if he had not subscribed to a higher law abrogating condign punishment for violations of their peculiar institutions; or in other words if he, in common with the other aborigines. who acknowledge the jurisdiction of Liberia promise to refer all matters of difficulty arising among them to the government of Liberia for adjudication, independent of this newly acquired position his plea would have been an effectual bar in arrest of judgment. But here he found himself bound. and as those who are bound must obey he abides the decision of the authorities.

The trial continued two or three days and a number of witnesses examined; it was held before Hon S. A. Benson V. P. and Superintendent for this county who appointed as associates of the inquisitorial court the venerable Judge Hanson and A W. Gardner Esqr. and after a careful examination of the charge that Boeflaw had attacked with an armed force, Topanyneo's town pillaged it at and reduced it to ashes and killed some of the inhabitants. it was pronounced by the court of investigation that, Boeflaw is guilty of the charge, which is well sustained by the depositions of his own witnesses; and that Boeflaw pay a fine of four hundred dollars for his misconduct, one half to be paid Topraneo to reimburse him for damages sustained and one half to the government as a punishment for his iniquity, and to pay the expenses of the government incured in bringing the offender to justice

The violation of the devil law above alluded to is this; according to the devil law the devil bush is sacred; no stranger shall enter therein: nor shall any violence be done to its sacred branch. Boeflaw charged Topanyo with cutting down his Topra nes devil bush to plant a farm, and sent a messenger to Topraneo to enquire why had he committed this great outrage against their sacred laws Topanee denyed the allegation saying; how can I be so base as to forget and abuse the tree when I was initiated into the mysteries of our sacred institution; it is not so. It appears, however, that the farms had encroached somewhat on the devil bush, so Boeflaw stired up others of his country men, enlisted several of the kings in his service, among whom Wie of New Sess is prominent, marched against Topranee's town and leveled it to the dust. The rest of the insurgents, were cited and attended their trial with the exception of Wie, who refuses to come to justice. he like the guilty Irishman dont want justice.

Boeflaw being the prime mover and the others that appeared being merely mercenary adherents were fined smaller amounts, with the promise of better behaviour on their part in future.

Boeflaw was informed that he might refer his case to the court of law and admiralty of Quarter Sessions if he felt dissatisfied with the decision of the executive department, he declined. as the natives have had a dreadful idea of that court ever since some murderers were by it sentenced to death and executed. They think that it is death to appear at the bar of that tribunal when the prisoner has taken the life or caused to be taken the life of his fellow man. It puts death in the pot of the assassin. so they had rather be deprived of all they possess than to appear there.

There are other inmates of the prison who are also natives who were committed on the charge of stealing Palm oil on a large scale from J. C. Marshall and also have to stand their trial at the next court of Quarter Session.

Several important buildings are in progress of erection. The foundation of the new court house on fort hill is laid and the superstructure which is to be of brick is being raised. It occupies a very commanding position. On the next square the Ladies Dorcas Society are making vigorous exertions to build an Asylum for the poor; their constitution makes a provision for life membership (honorary) of ladies and gentlemen by the payment of ten dollars; all amounts thus collected are to be devoted to that purpose they also crave social contributions at home and abroad. Who will contribute and who will constitute himself or friend an honorary life member? The agent Dr Smith will cheerfully acknowledge any thing that can be made available.

The new mission building in the Cove in the rear of the lower lagoon is nearly finished and an improving appearance. It is owned by the Protestant Episcopal Mission which designs to establish at that place a Seminary of learning. The Seminary building will be commenced in a few months if the mission can command means sufficient to effect it. If the Cresson fund could be made available, the Mission will be enabled to carry out its grand designs in the department of literature and be of incalculable benefit to our county and through it to our dear country.

The station is named Cresson; it is on the border of the sea, a lagoon intercepts a portion of it from the sea, but at times the sea sweeps over the small strip of beach and lashes the entire front of the Mission Grounds; in other words its frontier is washed by the water's of port Cresson. We hope therefore that no caviling will be indulged respecting Cresson's legacy of 10,000 to the Mission at Port Cresson.

Here is Cresson mission washed by the majestic waves Port of Cresson!

Come executors be liberal minded dont cavil any longer but let the mission have the money; it could not have been the intention of that generous minded man to have the government bribed with $ 10,000 to change Buchanan into port Cresson; no, he learnt that the harbour was named after him and as there would be a mission established at this point he would endow with $ 10,000 its Seminary of learning, but as the Government prefered Buchanan before him as a name for their city he left the government or rather the city without a penny; its mission would not be to blame and as soon as the mission dubbed a place with the name of Cresson, Cressen's executors are bound for the 10,000.

The government has made the liberal grant of ten acres of land for the use of the mission as it purposes conducting their school on the manual labour system. agriculture and stock raising being a branch of their operations.

About a half mile below the mission premises is the site selected for the erection of a commodious Receptacle for emigrants to be conducted entirely on the hospital system: to which will be attached a bathing establishment stock yard and farm for the better maintenance of the establishment.

It is to be regretted however that notwithstanding considerable timber has been collected on the spot, and the Colonization Society is determined to make every arrangement for the comfortable accomodation of emigrants during their acclimation the work has to stop for want of means. Oh that the M Donough legacy may be made available and that the different state societies will take under consideration the paramount importance of making preparations here to receive immigrants; unless this is done fearful mortality will continue for the want of proper apartments. Perhaps some good millionaire will help us out; dont let this work fail friends for want of means.

Private buildings of improved style, and highly creditable to our enterprising citizens add life to our settlements in this county. I may speak of this more particularly at another time.

The Hall of the Young Men's Literary association is undergoing repairs. The association is eliciting considerable interest in this city

The Ladies Literary Institute are trying to vie with the association, this is a laudable emulation may it continue. Mr Henry M. West gave us an interesting and very appropriate address on the twenty sixth of July last; the address has been solicited for publication and will fall into your hands.

The Hon. M. A. Rand was the orator of the day at Edina he is reported to have done well. We have no doubt that friend Crummell gave you a rich feast.

Some of us are trying to infuse a spirit of general improvement in our community.

There have been several deaths from drowning in the St John River. A Canoe with Palm oil for J. D. Preston was capsized on the 28th July and a native was drowned: on the same evening it appears that a Mr. James Jordan with four natives, attempted to cross the river at night in a small canoe, the canoe filled and sank, and with it Jordan and three of the natives sank beneath the flood.

Jordan was a promising young man in the bloom of life, and vigour of health; he came to this country in the unfortunate "Harp," in August 1854.

We stand very much in need of a press, and hope that your sheet will improve in appearance. We often hear our good citizens say that they would send you correspondences if they could read them after you print them.

Be assured, Mr Editor I do not wish to cast any reflection upon your paper; yet as I am writing the news I feel that I cannot over.—look any thing tending to general improvement.

Episcopal Convocation; 1st Day's Session.

A. M.

The Monrovian Episcopal Convocation assembled on friday, 10th inst, in Trinity church, at 10½ o'clock A. M. where divine service was performed and the Holy communion celebrated, by the Rector of the Parish, the Rev Alexander Crummell, aided by his assistant, the Rev H[illegible]rene.

After the conclusion of public worship the

LIBERIA HERALD

Rector of the Parish to k the chair, ex-officio, and appointed Rev H. Greene Secy protem. The Secretary of the convocation being absent.

The Sec'y not being present, and the minutes bk, and rules for the governance of the convocation not at hand, the said rules were suspended for the day. A committee was appointed to report business for the consideration of the convocation

The chairman remarked that the subject of Glebe lands and a Society for the support of the widows and orphans of clergymen demanded attentions. The former, immediate; the latter, as soon as practicable.

A general conversation took place upon these, and other subjects partaining to the religious and educational interest of the church.

On motion, the convocation then adjourned to meet in the same place, in the the afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

P. M.

The convocation met pursuant to adjournment. The committee on business requested that they might have until the morrow morning to prepare their report. The place where to hold the next Annual convocation was next discussed. A committee was appointed to report upon the matter. The subject of Parish libraries supported by the chairman was brought forward. He explained their utility and the manner in which they could be best employed here.

Inquiry was made relative to the standing committees appointed at the last convocation. Answer was given by the chair. The committee on which he was appointed, he replied, had acted.

He had written for the books required, but had not, as yet, received them. He said, however that books to the amount of $ 50.00, had been requested to be sent to his disposal, from the "English Christian knowledge Society," by a gentleman in England who had heard of their great want of the same.

Mr Russell, the Rector of Clay Ashland &c, said, that no effort had been spared to advance the interest of religion and the progress of education in his parish. He had fitted up a room at Caldwell in which to hold church service and for school purposes, and had supported the latter; all of which had been done from his own resources.

The chairman said that religion and education might be greatly promoted in New York &c. if combined and judicious effort were used. He proposed Missionary sermons as a means and lay reading by church wardens. He said the whole burden of the support of the Virginia Mission had rested materially upon him, though now, having appealed to some English friends, he expected to receive from them means for its maintenance.

A discussion ensued upon the employment of lay readers and also upon the question, whether the Episcopal church in Liberia was governed by the canons of the Episcopal church of the United States of America.

On motion the convocation adjourned to meet on the morrow at 6 O clock A. M.

2nd Days Sessions

Saturday, 11 the inst.

A M.

The Convocation met pursuant to adjournment at 9 O'clock, opening Prayer by the Rector of the parish. Minutes of previous day read and approved. Committee on business reported. Their report was received. It was in substance. —that the state of the church and its schools gave gratifing evidence of prosperity, and of the favor of God. Yet nevertheless, that it was not what it ought to be or might be, if the noble efforts of the clergy were better sustained. They therefore presented the state of the present established churches and schools, the establishment of others and Glebe lands, as subjects demanding the earnest attention of the convocation. Each of these subjects was discussed, and ways and means proposed for carrying out the various plans announced.

The sum of $95.00 was subscribed for establishing a school at New York.

Reports of the Rectors and teachers were read A vote of thanks was given to the teachers for the manner in which they had conducted their schools. A conversation took place as to the better and cheaper material, wood or bricks for church and school building purposes.

There being no further business before convocation, the Gloria in Excelsis was sung ,prayer offered by the Rector, and on motion adjourned sine die.

Sunday 12th inst.

A M.

Morning Prayer was read by Rev H Greene assisted by A Russell, who read the Lesson The Litany, was read by Rev A Crummell, A B.

The Ante—communion service was read by A Crummell A. B assisted by Rev A Russell. Exhortations were made by Rev A Crummell A B and Rev A Russell

The Holy communion was administered to a large body of communicants, by the Rector of the Parish, assisted by the Rector of Clay Ashland, &c and Rev H. Greene.

P. M.

After Evening Prayer, Missionary addresses were delivered by Rev A. Crummell A B. Rev A Russell, and Mr H Williams.

EVENING.

Evening Prayer was read by Rev A Crummell assisted by Rev H Greene; sermon by Rev A Russell from 3 Timothy 3rd chap 16 verse, All Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

SPECTATOR

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Herald.—

Circumstances require that I should ask you to insert, some where in your columns, for public benefit, the following statement; of late, it has became a source of great annoyance to traders to our coast to be compelled to pay what we think a customary import duty; and, by way of trying to throw some odium upon us for demanding this requisition, they boastingly say that through them, that is, the amount of duties they pay into our treasury, our government is kept up.—and that in consequence of such an important consideration, they should and ought to be entitled, commercially to all the rights and privileges to which citizens of Liberia are entitled.

Now we waive all objections to such a course of reasoning as this, based as it is upon false principles, and therefore at variance with the settled policy of almost every nation, and proceed to show our citizens generally, how much or how little these complainers and boasters contribute to our treasury, in the main, for the support of our Government; as well as try to undeceive those who have not given themselves the trouble to examine the subject carefully; —and but for the deception practised upon the more unintelligent part of our citizens in this matter, I should have witholden the following detailed statement. That you may properly understand the accompanying calculation, I will simply remark.—the two columns below, show, respectively, the price at which the goods are imported into this market and the price at which the same goods are sold—

A imports the following articles of merchandize, on which he pays a duty of 8 per cent—viz.

100 Ps Romalls 48	$ 48.00	$ 1000.00
100 " Satin Stripe	110.00	250.00
109 lb Powder	11 50	118 00
10 bbls Flour	100.00	40.00
100 ps. Turky red	110.00	200.00
100 lb Sugar	6.00	15 00
100 doz Cutlasses	125 00	250.00
10 Tons Iron Pots	700 00	1300 00
	1210.50	$ 2273.00

Here, in the first place, we have an amount of goods imported, on which A pays a duty of 8 per cent, which amounts to $ 96.84

secondly, we have the gross amount of sales of said goods to B. which is $ 2273.000 on which A assesses, and compels B to pay a duty of six per cent which amounts to $ 136.38

by which transaction A gains, in addition to his former profits, the sum of $ 40.54

and which is 40 per cent, nearly, on the amount of duties paid into the Treasury, and hence this much over the actual price charged for his goods.

Now B, the purchaser, is a salaried officer of the Government, consequently when A makes a demand on him for his amount of purchase, B calls on the Secretary of the Treasury for so much of his salary as will liquidate the debt, which has increased to the enormous amount of $ 2409.38

A, paid into the Treasury in the first instance, as duties on his importation . . $ 96.84

and in the second place compels B to draw out of the Treasury what he claims as his just dues for duties on his gross sales, the sum of 136 38 giving himself as above stated, a bonus of $40 54; and after he has pocketed it, goes swagging down the street and tells the first "gump, he meets that he had just given his Government a lift," by paying into its Treasury $ 96.—, and then makes his way to his books and tells them, "here is $ 40.54 to go to the credit of your profit and loss account".

Now then, by the rule of three, if we be allowed to use it, If $ 1210.50 give $ 40.54 profit, what will a cargo of $ 25000.00 give? we answer $ 837.25

—three cargoes a year will give . . . 2511.75

a sum sufficient to pay the duties on an importation of $ 29094.00—a whole cargo, and all of it extorted from our citizens; where then are the grounds of either complaint or boasting on the part of the importers?

It is not our wish to cripple the legitmate business operations of any foreigner, nor to drive them from among us; but we do wish to tell them to their teeth, that we dont intend to swallow every thing which they choose to cram into our mouth for good. We do not regret our Constitution and laws guaranteeing the right of trade along our coast to every one, for by this act we wish to show our disposition to cultivate a friendly intercourse with all nations, as well as to prove to them that we have no desire whatever, to monopolize the whole coast trade to ourselves—but we do regret, foreigners using their endeavours to supplant our Legislature and becoming prescribers themselves of what we shall do and where we shall trade Unless traders with whom we have no treaty, cease their imposition and conform to our laws of commerce and revenue we shall be under the necessity of telling them "hands off." The above is merely an introduction to what might be said, and we defy any one to contradict it.—

Yours truly.

D. B. WARNER

To the Editor of the "Liberia Herald."

Sir.

In reference to an article in your paper of the 25th u't under the head of Dreadful Massacre of British Troops, I beg you will at your earliest convenience correct a mistake which, perhaps without your knowledge, seems to have arisen there.

The article alluded to states:

"We learn that extraordinary excitement prevailed at Sierra Leone &c: &c: &c: for the enforcement of payment by Bambah Mimah Lahy "THE CHIEF OF THAT COUNTRY" of certain indemnities to Sierra Leone merchants in "THAT RIVER," &c: &c: &c:

It would appear from this as if Bambah Mimah Lahy were the chief of Sierra Leone and as if the late unfortunate affray had originated in the Sierra Leone river.

Sierra Leone, as I scarcely doubt you must be aware Sir, belongs to Her Majesty Victoria, Queen of the united Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, inasmuch, as every inch of ground of the Peninsula is either owned by British subjects (liberated Africans by act of Parliament are British subjects after they have been adjudicated) or is properly of the Crown;—besides it is not Lease hold property, as some ignorant persons believe or wish it to be; but as good Free—hold as there is in Liberia.

But to the point;—Bamah Mimah Lahy is a powerful chief of the Moria country, although secondary to Tooday Wise the Caude of all the Moria Countries;—the former resides at the town of Mallagiah in the Mallacourie River almost a hundred miles distant from Sierra Leone, at which place the unfortunate and cruel affair took place.

By inserting this in your earliest number you will much oblige one who is happy of signing as

MR EDITOR,

In the "Liberia Sentinel" No 17, of March 17 1855 there appeared an article signed "A Looker On." The said article has lately been perused by a Captain of one of the African Mail Steamers who, anxious to correct any erroneous opinions as to the landing and shipping of cargo on the Sabbath that may exist, has requested me to state that "the Mail contractors do not consider Sunday as an impediment to the landing and shipping of Cargo, or do the Post Office Authorities of any place but London the despatch of business."

I have the honor to be,
Mr Editor,
Your most obedient humble servant,

DEATH OF THE REV: JOSEPH CLAY

PASTOR OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH OF MARHALL. MESURADO COUNTY,

This aged and devoted servant of God, sweetly fell asleep in Jesus on the 18th day of July after a short but severe illness.

Mr, Clay was born in Georgia U. S. A. and emigrated to this country in 1848 being fully convinced of his duty to labor for Christ in the land of his fathers. On his arrival to this country, he located at Sinoe, and immediately entered upon his work as a preacher of the gospel; but finding himself too circumscribed in this field of labor, he sought a wider scope, and soon in the Providence of God was called to labor for the church at Marshall, then wholly destitute of a Ministry. He accepted the call and soon left home to dwell among that people.

To them he proved an acceptable preacher and in Dec. 1853 was solemly set a part to the work of the ministry by ordination.

He labored much, though a greater portion of his time dependent upon his own hands for support; still he did not murmur, believing that He who had called him to the work was able to supply all his wants. Mr Clay was not an educated man, but possessed good natural abilities, and in his discourses confined himself to such things as he clearly understood. He preached Jesus.

Mr Clay was not without his faults, but like other men he had an evil heart to contend against which by the grace of God he was finally able to overcome and died triumphantly reposing entire confidence in the suffering and atonement of Christ. His death has left a vacancy in the little Church of Marshall. Who will fill it?

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW IN NEW YORK — An elaborate opinion has been given by Judge Edmonds as to the power of the New York Legislature to pass a prohibitory liquor law. He argues the point at great length, and sums up with the following conclusion:— 1. That it is competent for the Legislature to prohibit the domestic traffic in intoxicating liquors. 2 that the Act passed is constitutional and valid, and is applicable to imported liquors after leaving the importer's hands as any other. 3 that the means provided by the statute for the enforcement of its enactments are lawful and apt. 4. That the duty of enforcing the law is not confined to the officers specially named in it, but is devolved upon all those whose general duty it is to enforce any of the laws of the States against crime.

HEAVEN.

Oh, Heaven is nearer than mortals think.
When they look with a trembling dread
At the misty future that stretches on
From the silent home of the dead.

'Tis no lone isle in a boundless main,'
No brilliant but distant shore,
Where the lovely ones who are called away
Must go to return no more.

No; Heaven is near us; the mighty veil
Of mortality blinds the eye,
That we see not the hovering angel bands
On the shores of eternity.

Yet oft, in the hours of holy thought
To the thirsting soul is given
That power to pierce through the mist of sense
To the beauteous scenes of heaven.

Then very near seem its pearly gates,
And sweetly its harpings fall;
Till the soul is restless to soar away,
And longs for the angel call.

I know, when the silver cord is loosed,
When the veil is rent away,
Not long and dark shall the passage
To the realms of endless day.

The eye that shuts in a dying hour,
Will open the next in bliss;
The welcome will sound in a heavenly world
Ere the farewell is hushed in this.

We pass from the clasp of mourning friends
To the arms of the loved and lost;
And those smiling faces will greet us then,
Which on earth we have valued most.

CURIOUS RHYMES.

What is earth, sexton—A place to dig graves;
What is earth, rich man—A place to work slaves
What is earth, grey beard—A place to grow old;
What is earth, miser—A place to dig gold;
What is earth, school boy—A place for my play;
What is earth, maiden—A place to be gay;
What is earth, seamstress—A place where I weep
What is earth, sluggard—A good place to sleep;
What is earth, soldier—A good place for battle;
What is earth, herdsman—A place to raise cattle
What is earth, widow—A place of true sorrow;

ROBERT HALL.

In a sketch of the celebrated Robert Hall, the late Mr. Ray gives the following:

"He was at the Tabernacle the first time I ever preached in Bristol, and when I was little more than seventeen. When I came down from the pulpit, as I passed him, he said, 'Sir, I like your sermon much better than your quotations.' I never knew him severe upon a preacher, however moderate his abilities, if, free from affectation, he spoke with simplicity, nor tried to rise above his level. But, as to others, nothing could be occasionally more witty and crushing than his remarks. One evening, in a rather crowded place (I was sitting by him) a minister was preaching very finely and flouishingly to little purpose, from the 'white horse,' and the 'red horse,' and the 'black horse,' and the 'pale horse,' in the Revelation. He sat very impatiently, and when the sermon closed, he pushed out towards the door, saying, 'Let me out of this horse-fair.

"I was once in the library at the academy, conversing with one of the students, who was speaking of his experience, and lamenting the hardness of his heart. Mr. Hall, as he was next, taking down a book from the shelf, hearing this, turned towards him and said, 'well, thy head is soft enough; that's a comfort.' I could not laugh at this; it grieved me; for the young man was modest, and humble, and diffident. He must have felt it severely: and I have no doubt but Mr. Hall's reflections smote him afterwards for his apparent harshness. We must not fling about arrows, and if any of them pierce, say it was sport. Should not only ill-nature, but wit or humour, expose us to this evil, we know the prayer, 'Set a watch, O Lord, upon my mouth; keep the door of my lips.'

"A minister, popular too, one day said to me, 'I wonder you think so highly of Mr. Hall's talents. I was some time ago traveling with him into Wales, and we had several disputes, and I more than once soon silenced him.' I concluded how the truth was, and some weeks after, when his name was mentioned, Mr. Hall asked me if I knew him. 'I lately traveled with him,' said he, 'and it was wonderful, sir how such a baggage of ignorance and confidence could have been squeezed into the vehicle. He disgusted and wearied me with his dogmatism and perverseness, till God was good enough to enable me to go to sleep."

THE FIRST MAN I KILLED.

A young English sailor, on the verge of the Black Sea, gives an account of a skirmish in which he was engaged with a party of Russians, one of whom he shot. It shows how dreadful is war, how opposed it is to the sensibilities of our nature. In writing home to his friends the generous young sailor said:

"We dispersed a few hundred yards' distance from the beach, to keep the coast clear while the boats' crews made prizes of the guns. The enemy had the advantage of the wood, and also knowing the country well, and a troop of them showed in advance. We were ordered to fire I took steady aim and fired on my man at about sixty yards. He fell like a stone. At the same time, a broadside from the ——— went in among the trees, and the enemy disappeared, we could scarce tell how. I felt as though I must go up to him, to see whether he was dead or alive.—He lay quite still and I was more afraid of him lying so, than when he stood facing me a few minutes before. It's a strange feeling to come over you all at once that you have killed a man. He had unbuttoned his jacket, and was pressing his hand over the front of his chest, where the wound was. He breathed hard, and the blood poured from the wound and also from his mouth every breath he took. His face was as white as death, and his eyes looked so big and bright as he turned them and started at me: I shall never forget it. He was a fine young fellow, not more than five-and-twenty. I went down on my knees beside him, and my breast felt so full, as though my own heart would burst. He had a real English face, and did not look like an enemy. What I felt I never can tell; but if my life would have saved his, I believe I should have given it. I laid his head on my knee, and he grasped hold of my hand, and tried to speak, but his voice was gone. I could not tell a word he said, and every time he tried to speak the blood poured, out so I knew it would soon be over. I am not ashamed to say that I was worse than he; for he never shed a tear, and I couldn't help it. His eyes were closing when a gun was fired from the ——— to order us aboard, and that roused him. He pointed to the beach, where the boat was just pushing off with the guns, which he had taken, and where our mariners were waiting to man the second boat, and then he pointed to the wood, where the enemy was concealed. Poor fellow! he little thought how I had shot him down. I was wondering how I could leave him to die and no one near him, when he had something like a convulsion for a moment, and then his face rolled over, and with a sigh he was gone. I trust the Almighty has received his soul. I laid his head gently down on the grass and left him. It seemed so strange when I looked at him for the last time. I some how thought of every thing I had heard about the Turks and Russians, and the rest of them; but all that seemed so far off, and the dead man so near."

A PUZZLED YANKEE.

The following extract of a letter from a Yankee correspondent of the Galveston News, is highly amusing:

Well, I put up with a first rate, good natured fellow, that I met at a billiard table. I went in and was introduced to his wife, a fine, fat woman—looked as though she lived on laffin, her face was so full of fun. After a while—after we'd talked about my girl, and about the garden, and about the weather, in come three or four children, laffin, and skippin, as merry as crickets.—There was no candle lit, but I could see they were fine lookin' fellows, and I started for my saddle-bags, in which I put a lot of sugar candy for the children as I went along.

'Come here,' said I, 'you little rogue, come here and tell me what your name is,'

The oldest came to me and says: 'My name is Peter Smith."

'And what's your name, sir?'

'Bob Smith.'

The next said his name was Bill Smith, and the fourth said his name was Tommy Smith. I gave 'em sugar candy, and old Mrs. Smith was so tickled that she laughed all the time. Mr Smith looked on, but didn't say much.

'Why,' says I, 'Mrs. Smith, I would not take a good deal for them four boys, if I had 'em—they are so beautiful and sprightly.'

'No,' said she, laffin,' I set a good deal on 'em, but we spoil 'em too much.'

'No, no,' says I 'they're prime well behaved children; and by gracious,' says I, pretended to be startled by a striking resemblance between the boys and the father, and I looked at Mr. Smith. I never did see anything equal to it,' says I: your own eyes, mouth, forehead, and perfect picture of hair, sir,' tapping the oldest on the pate. I thought Mrs Smith would have died laffin' at that her arms fell down by her side, and she shook the whole house laffin.'"

'Do you think so, Col. Jones,' said she, looking towards Mr. Smith, and I thought she'd go off in a laffin fit.

'Yes,' says I, 'I do rally.'

'Ha, ha, haw! says Mr. Smith kind o' half laffin, 'you are too hard on me now with your jokes.'

'I ain't jokin at all' says I, they are handsom children, and do look wonderfully like you.'

Just then a gal brought a light in, and I'll be darned if the little brats didn't turn out to be blacks—every one of 'em! and their hair was as curly as the blackest person's! Mr. and Mrs Smith never had any children, and they sort of petted them niggers as playthings

I never felt as streaked as I did when I found out how things stood. If I hadn't kissed the nasty things I could a got over it; but kissing 'em showed I was in earnest. Though I was soft sooping 'em all the time, how to get over the scrape I didn't know. Mrs Smith laughed so hard when she saw how confused I was, that she almost suffocated.

A little afterwards, there was a whole family of relations arrived from the city, and turned the matter off; but the next morning I could see that Mr Smith did not like the remembrance of what I said and I don't believe he'll vote for me when the election comes. I 'spect Mrs Smith kept the old fellow under the joke for some time.

RUINS OF THE ALEXANDRIAN LIBRARY.—It is stated in the Daily News that Capt. Newenham an Admiralty agent on the Southampton station, who has just returned from Alexandria visited while there the ruins of Alexandrian Library. A large mound in the Alexandria has been believed for ages to mark the spot where once stood the famous library which was burned by the Caliph Omar. This mound is now in process of removal. Splendid houses are to be built on its site. While Capt. Newenham was there, an immense stone of blue granite was dug out, which weighed several tons and is covered work; bearing evident marks of having been fused together by intense heat. The Captain learnt in Egypt that the French savant who discovered the burned city of Soccarah, beyond Grand Cairo, was packing up an immense number of treasures for transportation to France.

The celebrated preacher Rowland Hill, was very fond of mending old clocks. Once at a friend's he had retired, as the company supposed' before preaching, to consider his sermon; but on the host's entering the room to inform him that the time had arrived for going to the place of worship, he found him with an old clock all to pieces on the table. Mr. Hill said to him:

"I have been mending your clock, and I will finish it to morrow."

He preached with more than usual ease and fervor, and drew several beautiful images from the occupation in which his friend to his surprise, had found him engaged.

He rode a great deal, and by exercise preserved vigorous health. On one occasion, when asked by a medical friend what physician and apothecary he employed, to be always so well, he replied:

"My physician has always been a horse, and my apothecary an ass!"

A constable, who had lately been inducted into office, was in attendance on the Court, and was ordered by the Judge to "call John Bell and Elizabeth Bell."

He immediately began at the top of his voice.

"John Bell and Elizabeth Bell—John Bell and Elizabeth Bell—JOHN BELL AND ELIZABETH BELL."

"One at a time," said the Judge.

"One at a time—one at a time—ONE AT A TIME!" shouted the constable.

"Now you have done it!" exclaimed the Judge, out of patience.

"Now you've done it—now you've done it—NOW YOU'VE DONE IT!" yelled the constable.

There was no standing this. The court, bar and by standers broke out into a hearty laugh, to the perfect surprise and dismay of the astonished constable.

THE HARPERS' NEW FIRE PROOF BUILDINGS.—A Correspondent of the Traveler, gives an account of the extent and structure of the new buildings of the Harpers, establishment, as follows:

Harper's new buildings are nearly finished, and will be one of the "elephants" of this great city. These gentlemen lost, it is said, $800,000 by the fire which destroyed their former establishment and they determined to profit by their experience and consequently decided that their new structure should be fire proof. The buildings now nearly finished have a front of about 300 feet on Pearl, and the same on Cliff streets, and are already partly occupied. They are six stories high, and not a particle of wood has been used in their construction; even the window sashes are cast iron. A novel feature is the use of wrought iron beams throughout. These beams are to look something after the manner of railroad iron of the T. pattern, and are placed about three feet apart between which brick arches of four inches rise are constructed, over which a floor is made of cement, and when completed, nothing can be more durable or substantial. These iron beams are made by Messrs. Cooper & Hewitt, the patentees, at Trenton, N. J., who, I understand, have large orders from the United States Government. Messrs. Duncan, Sherman & Co., are using them in the the construction of their new banking house, and it is said the saving in insurance on stores would in a few years pay the extra cost over wood, and they will, no doubt, come into general use for public buildings, stores, factories, &c. Presbyterian

MAKING BRIDES.—A traveller in Germany says: "The Germans, by the way, have a queer way of making 'brides,' and of doing some other things in the courting and marrying way which may interest you, perhaps. When a maiden is betrothed, she is called a 'bride,' and so continues till she becomes 'wife.' All the while she is engaged 'bride." The lovers, immediately upon the betrothal, exchange plain gold rings which are even worn afterwards till death parts them. The woman wears hers on the third finger on the left hand, and when she becomes 'wife,' her ring is transferred to the third finger of the right hand, and there it remains. The husband also wears his ring just as the wife wears hers, so that if you look upon a man's hand you can tell whether he is mortgaged or not. There is no cheating for him ever after—no coquetting with the girls, as if he were an unmarried man; for lo! the whole story is told by his finger ring. A married Viennese lady was much amused when I told her that in our country we only 'ring' the women, but let the husband run at large unmarked! "Oh, that is dreadful!" said she, more than half shocked, 'Think, there is Frederick, my husband—only twenty four—so young, so handsome—and all the girls would be taking him for an unmarried man, and be making love to him! Oh, it is dreadful, is it not? They would never know he was married. How could you do so in your country? I would not live there with Frederick for the world.'"

JEWISH METHOD OF SLAUGHTERING ANIMALS.—The following is from a paper read by A. K. Gardiner, M. D., before the New York Academy of Medicine, and published January, 1853:

"The usual method of slaughtering animals in this city is, first to stun the beast by a blow of an ax between the horns, then to cut the throat and suspend them by the hind legs to allow them to bleed to death. The Jew butchers do not prostrate the animal with the ax, but first suspend, and then cut the throat. This must be performed in a peculiar manner.

"It is necessary to have a long knife, which must be free from rust, nick, or any imperfection of the cutting edge, one cut only being allowed. If more is required, or any formality neglected, the animal is deemed unfit for food for the Hebrew. After the animal is dead he is examined by the Jew butcher. This is done by cutting into the plural and abdominal cavities, running the hand in and feeling the lungs and liver.—Should these organs be found adherent to the sides, or should any hard lumps be felt in them the butcher places a leaden tag upon the animal inscribed with the Chaldaic word tripha, signifying improper or unfit. On the contrary, should these organs be found healthy and the operation of killing be otherwise correctly performed, the tag stamped kosher, proper or fit, is then placed upon the various portions of the animal. For the Hebrews it is only placed upon the fore quarters. From the difficulty of removing the blood-vessels, as required by their law, from the hind quarters, this portion is rarely eaten by the Hebrews, but the mark is placed upon them for the benefit of many Christians, who prefer the meat thus examined. The butcher is paid by the society in which he worships, an annual salary, and in addition, receives a small sum from the keeper of the slaughter-house for his services."

The leading English journals complain bitterly of the cost of the war. The London Times gives the totals expenses for twelve months at eighty millions of dollars. For the present year the expenditure will be still greater, unless peace shall be declared. The calculation is that at least one hundred millions would be necessary, and with the best view of the subject, at least fifty millions of dollars must be raised annually, as long as the war may last, either by an appeal to the money market, or by doubling the rates upon the tax payers.

NOTICE.

The Citizens of Monrovia are hereby informed that a new effort is about to be made, for the promotion of good morals and religion among the natives in and about our city. Every Sunday at half past two O'clock, religious instruction will be imparted to such natives as may attend, at the Chapel erected for their benefit at Krootown. All persons wishing well to the cause of African civilization, and Christianization; and desiring the welfare of the heathen around us, are requested to send their native Children and youths regularly. The effort we hope will be the means of securing a better observance of the Lord's day among the natives as well as of increasing their knowledge of the "Common Salvation" purchased for them by Jesus Christ, May the lord help us, as a Christian community, to do our duty with respect to our heathen neighbours. EXTRACTS FROM THE ORATION OF REV ALEXANDER CRUMMELL A. B. DELIVERED BEFORE THE CITIZENS OF MONROVIA JULY 26TH 1855.

We have been favored with the following extracts from the Oration of Rev Mr Crummell which we submit to our readers as specimen of its eloquent and elaborate character.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

"This is the festival of our National Independence: the day of all the year, dedicate to popular joy and thanksgiving, the sober thought of national responsibility, and the earnest pondering upon future destinies. Let us accept the delights and privileges it offers; tempering the calmer reflection of maturer years, and the sage wisdom of age."

THE SUBJECT OF THE ORATION.

"You will remember that the first Anniversaries of this Republic have passed away; and the glowing exuberance of new-born nationality has given way to care, to thought, to the consciousness of burdened duty, and to the deep anxiety of citizenship and governmental responsibility.

The burdens of state are increasing daily. Deep and mighty questions are constantly arising. More and more are we brought into relation with foreign lands. And young as we are the future begins to loom upon us with import and solemnity. And hence we may, more properly on this day think about our duties and obligations as a christian state, and ponder the responsible future coming quickly upon us.

It is the presentation of these thoughts, gentlemen, which seems to me to dictate as a topic fit for consideration and discussion, this day —

"THE DUTY OF A RISING CHRISTIAN STATE, TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE WORLD'S WELL BEING AND CIVILIZATION; AND THE MEANS BY WHICH IT MAY PERFORM THE SAME

PROOF FROM HISTORY

For such is the light which shines even from the gloom of history; from one single pair and parentage, a race, from the dawn of history to the days of Noah. From the Deluge, three discinct forms of family and race, which have again budded into life and energy, divers nationalities of immortal renown, and of commanding name, through all the tracks of time. And then again since the days of our Lord Christ, and especially since the Reformation, how the Scandinavian, the Norman and other races have streamed out from their homes or hives in the far North; and formed those great and mighty nations, which, notwithstanding the evident semi—barbarism of ages, and their brutal love of fight, have mastered the the world by law and genius and learning and science, and the genial out-growings of art; and have blessed mankind by the Religion which has ever tempered their rudeness. Nor yet is it Europe alone that feels the trend of their feet and the might of their presence and influence. They have gone out in commerce, in companies, and colonies in compacts and unions, and in corporations and Missions; streaming along both sides of the North American continent, and leaving, as their footprints on those mighty shores, cities and states, commonwealth and kingdoms, filling the Archipelagoes of both the eastern and the western Hemispheres, with their offsprings, their laws, letters and religion, dipping down into the far south seas, and sowing the seeds of European civilization, among the scattered remnants of the Malayan race, far off in the wide, wide ocean: planting the germs of their restless energy, their creative intellect and their vital faith, on the shores of Africa and of India, aiming thence to bear them to the steppes of the Asia, on the one hand, to the high table lands which stretch out from nigh the mountains of the moon on the other.

PROGRESS, MAN'S DESTINY

The race in the aggregate is to go onward and upward. This is the destiny which God has incorporated in the very elements of human being

The failure of this type, or the destruction of that form is no preventive of nature's upward reaching. They are the falling of the leaves in a foreign Autumn, without which in spring time the forest appears again apparelled in beauty, and gorgeously laden with masses of foliage. And to this advancement all the sections of the race are to contribute their quota of gift and influence. And thus we see that all the preceding generations of mankind and all the broods of nations have lived for every successive generation; all have been the workers for, and the benefactors of, this age in which we live, and of this land too which we call our country, and our home. And so there is no isolation; no absolute disseverance in individual nations: for blood and lineage, and ancient manners, and religion, and letters, and culture, and commerce all tend to link all nationalities together despite the lapses and intervals of time.

MAN LIVES FOR MAN.

Indeed it is no exaggeration to say that our life, and culture, and civilization are but the result of the ceaseless energy of mind and toil of all past nations. And of all these nations, we are grateful men, we are bound to turn to Palestine, and Greece, and Italy, with beaming eyes, and, to appropriate the words of Arnold, to draw near with reverence" to them as the brighter causes, which proceeding directly from the inscrutable will of our Maker, seemed destined to humble the presumption of fancying ourselves the arbiters of our destiny;" and if I may add my own words to his profound lay and resignation, seemed designed also to teach us as a nation that we are not to live for ourselves merely, but to bless the present generation of nations; and to send down the beneficence of our regards and activities to other peoples and to future times!

HUMAN WELL BEING THE DUTY OF NATIONS.

One remarkable evidence of the genial influence of morality upon the law of nations is the fact that the chief states of christendom, have concertedly and from the pure principles of humanity, discouraged and condemned the slave-trade. So likewise the cause of peace which once was the scoff of wits, has now lost its supposed fitting jests: for at this day grey haired veterans in statescraft recognize with clearness the binding tie of humanity, and esteem it the highest, noblest achievement of diplomacy to stay the effusion of blood and to bind in concord the families of nations. I unhesitatingly venture the belief that Russell the statesman would rather have won a peace for the Allies at Vienna, than to have been the hero of Alma, Balaclava, or of Inkerman. And to gain power as a minister of England that thereby we may staunch the wounds of bleeding nations is, I feel assured, a higher object of ambition to the mercurial and ambitious D'Israeli, than would be all the boast of military renown. And this not merely from considerations of policy or from motives of gain; but because the civilization of England has been interpenetrated by the Faith of England; and other large minded statesmen recognize the obligations of morality in all the machinery of statesmanship.

CONTRADICTION OF PROVERBS.—"The more the merrier" Not so; one hand is enough in a purse.

"Nothing but what has an end." Not so; a ring has none, for it is round

"Money is a great comfort." Not when it brings a thief to the gallows.

"The world is a long journey." Not so; the sun goes over it every day.

"It is a great way to the bottom of the sea." Not so; it is but a stone's cast.

"A friend's best found in adversity." Not so; for then there's none to be found.

"The pride of the rich makes the labor of the poor." Not so; the labor of the poor makes the pride of the rich.

A GENTLE HINT.—When Castel-fuerte was viceroy in Lima, he was summoned by the inquisition, and attended accordingly. Taking with him to the door as body guard a company of infantry, and two pieces of artillery, he entered, and having his watch on the table, told the inquisitors that if their business were not despatched within one hour, the house would be battered down about their ears, for such were the orders he had left with the commanding officer at the gate. This was quite sufficient; the inquisition rose and accompanied him to the door too happy when they beheld the backs of his excellency and his escort.

The Greytown Outrage—The English Consul at Greytown has presented the claims of English, French, German, and native residents, which amount to about a million and a half dollars, for damage done, when the town was destroyed by the U. S. ship of war Cyane.

LIBERIA HERALD

DOWANTE;

OR JACK'S HISTORY AND THIRTEEN MINOR POEMS, BY ROBERT H. GIBSON.

Mr Editor:—

When I saw it announced in your last number that a volume of poetry, written by a Liberian would "be out in a few days," I was almost transported with joy—hoping—though I did not expect anything extraordinary—that the book would be of such a character as at least, to afford some slight remuneration to those who would spend their money in its purchase, and their time in its perusal; I hoped that, there would be here and there throughout the book, some scintillations of genius that might serve to illumine somewhat the pathway, and cheer the hearts of those in Liberia who are endeavoring to find their way up the difficult height of science. The book has appeared with the above title. "I have purchased and looked over a copy. To say that I have been, disappointed and mortified would be to express, in the mildest terms possible, the character of my feelings.

"In every effusion claiming the high character of poetry, two attributes, at least, have usually been looked for. The one, thought, or common sense; the other rhythm or measure; and when rhyme has been effected, a third quality has usually been demanded.—'a concord in sound at measured and regular intervals.' This species of writing therefore requires not only a faculty of making verses—or causing words to conform in sound at the end of lines—an attainment which seems to have been studiously sought after by the author of "Dowante"—but it needs talents of an extraordinary order Poetry has been called the 'language of the passions, the echo of the imaginations,' the thoughts of the poet must glow with feeling, sympathy and interest; his words winged with flame like the kindled arrow, 'must gather new fires as they are sped to their goal; 'he must possess that power called genius by which grace, novelty and attractions are imparted to the most common place subject. It is the prerogative of genius to produce novel impressions from familar objects.' Unless this power is possessed, all attempts at poetic writing, will only be the means of bringing into existence matter to excite the humor of the intelligent, and of subjecting the writer to ridicule and contempt.

When a lively, graceful, and charming style has been attained, the sentiments are to considered, 'No common place sentiment must be elevated to the throne of egesas; no low born thought must be introduced into the temples of the muses'

The ideas must be of such a character as to enlist the feelings, draw forth the sympathy—evoke and nourish the interest of the reader; for generally, 'where excitement ends, disgust begins,' Hence the advice of the ancient poet:

'Tis not enough, ye writers, that ye charm
With ease and elegance; poems should warm
With soft affection; should possess the soul
And, as they will, the listening crowd control.'

I do not, Mr. Editor, assume to possess the intelligence, good sense, learning and sagacity of the critic; nor do I pretend that I could have produced a poem of any more merit than "Dowante;" but I beg that you will indulge me with space in your columns merely to call the attention of your readers to certain passages in this book which I marked while perusing it. The volume opens with a poem, in three books, purporting to be a history of a native African whom the author calls "Jack." He was, at the age of seven years, taken from his native land to America, where he was sold as a slave; having passed several years in servitude, he was emancipated and sent back to Africa. &c In perusing the three books, "the most remarkable circumstance that attracts the attention of the reader is the abrupt and random manner in which the hero is frequently brought in and made to relate the story himself, at the option and convenience of the poet.

The first book begins with an invocation of the Muses.—"Descend O Muse!"—doubtless in imitation of Milton and other poets upon whom the Muses did really alight; and whose writings, unlike the production now before us, are in interesting accordance with the character and dignity of the inhabitants of Parnassus.

The poet introduces his hero thus;

"Young Jack, poor soul! just seven years of age," and gives a description of his father as follows:

"His father (tho' a heathen) was a sage,
Fill'd with a wisdom heathens seldom have.
And was resorted to by men, to lave
Their genius in his;—to catch the flame,
That flowed from him."

Jack's father was certainly a wonderful man We are informed first that he was resorted to by men, who went to "lave" that is, to "wash or bathe their genius in his," which evidently conveys the idea of the existence of water, or some liquid matter in which to lave; then in the next line, we are told they resorted to him to "catch the flame that flow'd from him." Query Did the water of genius, and the fire of genius exist in him at the same time? or did they fill his soul by turns?

An account is then given of a "horrible war" that "broke out and rag'd," in which Jack who in youthful inadvertence, "went to spy the scene' was taken prisoner.

At the 30th line the poet introduces his hero and makes him relate himself the circumstances attending his capture and embarkation on board the slave ship which took him to America. At the 61st line Jack ceases to speak; from the 62nd to the 70th the poet tells of Jack's first impressions of the American shore as he viewed it from the deck of the slave ship—upon which having been lifted up—he stood, looking, "as slim, as if he could eat a peck." On his landing in America an auction was held at which Jack was sold to a "Carolina man."

At the 77th line Jack again speaks, tells his feeling after being sold, as he trod the American soil

"A" poor lonesome boy, but seven years of age."

At the 89th line the poet speaks for Jack; but 24 years of his life have passed and he is now forty one. He hears of the Colonization Society, and wishes to place himself under its patronage that he might be aided in returning to his native Land, and "end the balance of his earthly race." In the 95th line he is represented as soliloquizing upon his troubles and the difficulties that stand in the way of his return to Africa At the 111th line he addresses a petition to Heaven—that he might be prepared to die and fitted for "Sweet Canaan's blessed rest." These ejaculations close the first book.

The second book which gives an account of of Jack's emancipation, and preparation to return to Africa.—opens with a continuation of the prayer, that ends the first book, thus;—

'O thou Almighty, who dost interpose
Who diedst for even I, and then arose:

Here the poet manifests his need of a little more acquaintance with his grammar. I am aware that poets are allowed great license with language, on account of the limits to which, in versification, they are obliged to confine themselves: but I can see no possible excuse for the innocency in this instance; as to have said. "Who diedst for even me"—which would have been correct—would not have altered in the least the number of feet in the line But this may have been an oversight in the author.

I cannot Mr Editor notice this book in detail, as it would be trespassing too much on your kindness, and would weary the patience of your readers; I will call attention only to that portion of it contained from the 88th to the 92nd line which describes the effect, which the announcement, made by his master, of his manumission, had upon Jack. The poet says—

"He leaps up from his knees and then bows
[to earth;]
Jumps in the kitchen, lies upon hearth;
Calls Sue dear love, sugar'ter, honey, wife
Gives her a kiss, the first time in his life."

"What monkey tricks for a man of Jacks intelligence; but it is very singular that he should never have kissed his wife before. At the age of forty one, he must, have been married at least ten years, and if during so long a residence together he never kissed her or called her "dear," he must have been remarkably frigid in his affections and utterly insensible to all those charms and delights—those fascinations and enchantments, which in my imagination hover around the domestic hearth.

The third book—for we must leave the second—gives an account of the sailing of Jack for and arrival at the coast of Africa—his first impressions of the country &c &c. This like the first book, begins with a prayer to the Muses: We now find Jack with his wife Sue—'launched on the deep—

To scan the seas, and take a lasting peep."

But it seems he had not proceeded far on the voyage, before

"A squall struck in the ship a mighty swell
When all was sleep but one, and he as well;
The waters bursted in the cabin door."

"All was sleep but one, and he as well "Did you ever Mr Editor, in all your life hear of a ship at sea, having all the crew and passengers asleep" but one? In all the tales of the sea I have heard in all the stories of marine adventures and calamities I have read, this is the first instance I have met of "all on board asleep but one, and he as well. But we should like to know about this one who is made an exception—as well as what was he all were sleep, and he as well. What condition was he in? Of course the idea conveyed is, that he was as well as asleep—and therefore to all intents and purposes, he was asleep—Then all were asleep—The ship was certainly in a perilous condition—on the wide ocean—having passengers on board—and every solitary individual asleep,. Strange, strange occurrence indeed! But perhaps this narration is not to be taken literally, but to be regarded as the result of the author's poetic imagination—the product of his creative genius. Well, we must award him the palm for orginality—This is certainly rich and perfectly original.

The word "bursted" in the second line is in bad taste, as well as a violation of the rules of grammar; "burst" being an irregular verb does not take ed to form the preterit tenses. But it is likely that the poet was here at a loss for a foot and was obliged to commit this grammatical peccance to complete the measure. Though he might have saved himself this trouble, by writing the preposition which follows bursted in to instead of "in" which would have been more according to rule after such a verb, then without the addition of ed, to "burst" he would have secured the desired number of feet.

But to the story;—The storm passes and the ship progresses on its course; at length Africa is in view. The captain is represented as "boasting to his mates and sailors" The "passengers rejoice to see the sight."

"But Jack," says the poet sings out aloud
And suddenly astonishes the crowd" by delivering a lengthy speech of his impressions of the country; expressing his regret of his waste of time in America when he ought to have been enjoying freedom in Africa, Turning to his wife Sue, he thus addresses her;—

Now Sue, we see a land of earthly rest,
Whose fields look fair and seem by Heaven
[blest]
Awake shake off thy slavish fears and sing,
Sweet freedom's voice, and make it loudly
[ring]

He then expatiates on the character and capabilities of the country—which are to be developed dy the rising generation, expresses an earnest desire for progress in literature; and promises to do wonderful things if he

"Could see his country-men adore,
Sweet literature's sound, if nothing more!"

Listen to all that Jack would do:—

My soul would fill and burst into the skies
A loud rejoicing with a great surprise.
I'd scan the skies by meditations sweep,
Then by my fleeting thoughts sink in the [deep.]
I'd stop not here, but sink down to the sand
And scratch the bottom with my feeble [hand:—]
Write in the mud, that literature's art,
Begins to take among my race a start

Notice; first his "soul would fill and burst in to the skies;" after bursting it would scan the skies by meditation; then, from such a lofty height, his fleeting thoughts" would sink into the deep. But he would not stop on the surface of the water, he would go down to the sand, and "scratch the bottom—"and" write in the mud, Sue! The poet's transition from the sublime to the ridiculous is most remarkable; first his heroe would be up to the skies, then darting downwards would plunge into the deep—and going to the bottom of the sea would there write in mud—the interesting fact that literature had taken a start among his race! A very ineligible place we should think to make so important a record, "in mud, at the bottom of the sea" None would be able to discover it, but those who like Jack, should take such wonderful flights; and even could the inscription be seen by all, we think that none would like to endure the inconvenience and unpleasantness of stooping to read it in such a situation but those possessed of boarish propensities.

Having reached the conclusion of Jacks eloquent address to the "astonished" crew of the ship, we expected to find some account of his disembarkation; his impressions of his new home &c—but all is passed over in silence, and the poet informs us very coolly and abruptly at the conclusion of the third book:—

Jack's history here ends:—he dies in [peace,]
And leaves his country, after great increase,
He dies rejoicing o'er the glorious hope,
Of having earth, free as a Romish Pope."

After informing us of the demise of Jack the author gives us, in a succeeding poem, "Jack's soliloquy. Is the same Jack here alluded to? If so where was he, when he so pathetically soliloquized? Was he in America? Was he on the briny deep? Was he in Africa? Or was it the soliloquy of his manes after he had left the earth, "free as a Romish Pope?"

After Jack's soliloquy—follows "An epistle to Hon: Joseph T. Gibson—to brother of the author—expressing grat tude for he fraternal care bestowed upon him in childhood, He alludes to his dullness when a schoolboy and congratulates himself on the progress he has since made, in the following strains:—

I could not Brother think ten years ago,
That I, who laid and slept, just like a Bear
Should wake from lethargy, and dart along,
Through region far with poetic song.

The verb "laid" in the second line here should be lay—another error, overlooked by the poet. Is the comparison here instituted between himself and a "boar" used to express the squalidity of the position in which the writer lay; or is it to denote the despicable slothfulness in which he was accustomed to indulge?—a boar is extremely filthy and indolent in his habits, these are the most remarkable traits in his character; to which of these does the poet allude in the comparison?

After this epistle— follows a poem under the caption "Thoughts on Liberian Poets." On the 33rd page I find a poem under the very singular heading—"An address to a Guana," then follows another equally curious in its caption—"An address to a Baboon." Is it possible that in the whole animal kingdom, composed of such a variety of species no others could attract the attention of Mr G—but the Guana and Baboon? could no others call forth his poetic fire? Singular taste indeed for a poet! But this is not all, at the conclusion of his address to the Baboon, he thus, though a married man, makes love to that unsightly and repulsive creature;

Yet none shall touch thee, while I hold thee
[mine,
And thou by gentleness, dost own me thine"

We now come to the closing poem of the book, an "Epic sketch of the author" in which he reviews his life from eighteen and forty four; and is in some cases wonderfully minute in his narration; as, for instance in the 19th line, where he breaks forth thus:

"In forty-six, an ulcer seized my toe,
And fill'd my soul with earthly grief and [woe;
For thirteen months I laid upon my back,
And often did I think the pains would rack
My feeble frame * * * * *
My pains by day did often make me weep,
At night I could not lay in bed to sleep;—
But sat up in the chair, and pass'd the night,
In sighs and groans, caused by the ulcer's [fight"

Here again in the third line the word "laid" improperly occurs; in the seventh line the word "lay" should be lie. It is difficult, from what the writer says here, to ascertain the precise time during which he "laid upon his back;" for he first tells us that the time was thirteen months; then he informs us that at night he could not lay in bed, but "sat up in the chair." I suppose in order to get the exact time during which he lay upon his back, we must find the number of days contained in thirteen months, and the number of nights; subtracting the nights, when he sat in the chair, from the days when he laid upon his back", we shall have a remainder equalling the length of time he "lay upon his back" But this is immaterial.

With reference to his literary acquirements, the author with affected modesty, yet evident egotism makes the admission—

"I am no scholar" yet, says he, "the scholar's [part"
"Ill try to get by seeking wisdom's art;
My college was my study thro the night,
And with the dawn of day it took its flight
For oft times have I sat and scratch'd my [head
Until the clock struck two"—

It is well that the last two lines here cited occur near the end of the volume, otherwise we had been at a loss to account for the cause of the author "scratching his head" until so late an hour; but having perused the book we are satisfied judging from its character, that the scratching of the head was occasioned more by outward and superficial causes, than by any internal perplexity arising from the conflicting of profound thoughts or lofty and inspiring ideas.

We have now reached the end of the book, I cannot leave "Dowante" however without expressing my admiration of the enterprising spirit of the writer in making so bold an attempt to advance the literature of Liberia. It is human to err; and if he has failed it is no proof that he did not aim high, it is no evidence that he does not sincerely desire the advancement of his race. Indeed, judgeing from several sentiments advanced in the book we should consider Mr G enthusiastically devoted to the interests of his race and country and if his talents were only commensurate with his ambition, he would be a star in Liberia's literary firmament of no mean magnitude. But let him not despair; perseverance will overcome all obstacles. By perseverance several men who would otherwise have lived and died in obscurity have become eminent, and highly useful—Demosthenes—against whose progress, nature seemed to have opposed impassable barriers, became, by perseverance, the "prince of orators;" and why may not friend G. should he persevere make advancements beyond his most sanguine expectations? I hope he will not be dissuaded from further effort by my remarks. They have been made with the most friendly feelings, and with the best wishes for his literary welfare Hoping he will yet hit the mark, at which he aims.

I remain Your most Obedient &c

St Pauls River Liberia

On, on, ye dark waters rolling,
Hasting to the blue ocean's wave.
Say say—tell what thou art bearing
Far down in the wild ocean's cave.

Down, down thou art constantly pouring
Thy fearful, deep, bold, turbid tide,
Say, say for once, what thou art bringing
Far away from the Moon's mountain side.

Stay, stay a moment of staying
Wilt thou? ere thou leavest the main?
Say, say what art thou ere bringing
Where treasures for ages have lain.

Then, then tell me what thou hast torn
From those rugged mountains of gold,
Hidden treasures? fit to be worn,
To be deck the bride of the bold?

Speak, speak to hearts that are humming
While now on thy bosom they ride.
Say, say to loved hearts that are tuning
That no evil to them shall betide.

Aye, aye I hear thee not speaking
Yet a constant slave thou shalt be,
Not gold from mountain a bringing——
Only, but strong iron from sea.

Soon, soon on thy wave will be coming,
The restless wild Fire—king of speed,
He, he that by contract is ruling
The fierce stormy ocean and main.

Oh, oh then I'll set to laughing
When he comes puffing along,
At his steam whistle of warning
And his engine thunder of song,

On, on ye dark waters rolling
Soon no rocky falls will remain.
For the new fire god is upturning
The river, the mountain and plain.

LIBERIA HERALD.

By the arrival of the British Mail from the Windward, we were placed in possession of several numbers of the "New Era" of Sierra Leone. The excitement which had been created by the disastrous results of the Mallaghea expedition had in a great measure, passed away, and the people were turning their attention to business.

We observe that, in the 19th number of the Era dated August 4, the Editor has been pleased to notice an editorial article that appeared in our paper of July 11th on African nationality, to which he refers as follows:—

"We cannot refrain from expressing a difference of sentiment to our contemporary of the Herald, in an article on "African nationality" in the number of the 11 ult. In the main feature of this article we do not dissent but in one material statement we decidedly differ—it is this—"We believe that all that has been done to enslave and degrade us has been done under the permission of an Omnipotent and merciful Being "To us this sentence is a bold one and repulsive to our opinions on the doctrine of free agency. We know not of any passage of the scripture that invites us to do evil that good may come—and the essence of the dogma is contradictory of the attributes of the Creator"

Well, it is natural for men to differ in opinion; and when they do, unless led by a blind prejudice, it may be presumed that they do so upon grounds which they consider just and reasonable. Hence we supposed that after expressing his dissent from us, our cotemporary would have adduced his reasons, in support of his "decidedly different opinion;" but instead of this he enters into a detail of the rise and progress of the slave trade; recounts some of its horrors, &c; then without having produced one single argument to invalidate our position, he asks:—"With these melancholy facts before us, can we regard them as having been done under the permission of an Omnipotent and merciful Being?"

His manner of treating the subject places us in rather an awkward situation; we can discover no point in his remarks from which to begin a defence of ourself; unless we notice the latter part of the paragraph which we have quoted above. He says, "We know not of any passage of scripture that invites us to do evil that good may come; and the essence of the dogma is contradictory of the attributes of the Creator." This sentence it strikes us does not reach the subject under consideration. The question is not whether the Omnipotent and merciful Being caused to come to pass, "all that has been done to enslave and degrade us, for the purpose of educing good there from; but whether He permitted it. Our being "invited to do evil that good may come" has nothing to do with whether the Omnipotent and Omniscient Being has the universal control and governance of all things.—a doctrine, which, it seems to us, our statement involved. But our contemporary says the essence of the dogma is contradictory of the attributes of the Creator." If so, then the "attributes of the Creator" are contradicted" throughout the scripture. Have we not instances numerous and impressive in which we plainly perceive that the Almighty permitted much evil to be perpetrated? Take for example the case of that remarkable inhabitant of the land of Uz, "the greatest of all the men of the east;" to whose piety and uprightness God himself bore testimony. Witness his afflictions and trials. Was there ever mortal man who suffered more? Was there ever individual upon whom such an aggregation of calamities accumulated and in so rapid and overpowering succession? Today he is in health, wealth, and prosperity, surrounded by a large family of several sons and daughters; tomorrow he sits forlorn in ashes, deprived of all his children, stripped of all his substance, and afflicted with a direful and loathsome malady. Now how were this man's sufferings brought upon him? Are we not distinctly informed that he was afflicted by the special permission of God? If it were not that in this case the veil is somewhat drawn aside and we are allowed by the aid of revelation to contemplate Job's reverses from their origin they might, by those unwilling to recognize the hand of Providence in every event, have been attributed to the uncontrolled influence of Satan, without any reference to the Divine permission: as though that fallen spirit had supreme sway over any part of God's empire, either moral or physical. It must be borne in mind, however, that the idea and plan of distressing Job originated with Satan—doubtless for the sake of effecting as much evil as possible—and he was the immediate agent in bringing about the suffering of that good man, yet all the circumstances, horrible as they were, came to pass by the special permission of an Omnipotent and merciful Being. But this doctrine, according to our cotemporary of the "New Era," is contradictory of the attributes of the Creator.

Again; let us look around us, and notice the many evils that are done in the world by individuals to each other. Does not God permit one wicked man to injure the person of another? Nay, does He not suffer the wicked to injure and often to destroy the life and property of the good! Does He not suffer missionaries sent on errands of mercy and love to be robbed and killed by the very persons whose welfare they were contemplating? Does He not permit incendiaries to set fire to houses and cities? Does not pestilence with its mortiferous breath carry devastation and death through villages, towns and cities by His permission? Does not the fell monster" War.——in a moment

Lay waste the noblest part of creation by his permission? We do not profess an ability to explain why the Benevolent and merciful Creator suffers these things, when He might prevent them; but we do affirm as our deliberate conviction that nothing takes place in the vast universe, of the remotest corner of which the Almighty has intimate knowledge, and over which He excercises boundless control without His permission.

Again; take the case of the Israelites; look at that wonderful people whose progenitor Abraham, called the father of the faithful, held frequent intercommunications with God; were they not, although a "chosen people" and the descendants of so worthy an ancestor, suffered to be enslaved in Egypt, and to be subject to heathen task-masters who made them "serve with rigor," and "made their lives bitter with hard boadage" four hundred years? Surely our cotemporary will not deny that this was done under the permission of an "Omnipotent and merciful Being" If then the enslavement of the Israelites was done by Divine permission, why should it be considered "contradictory of the attributes of the Creator" to believe that the enslavement of the African race has been done under the same permission? Why should it be more absurd in the one case than in the other?

But our cotemporary says, that the sentence which he quotes from us, and from which he decidedly differs, is "repulsive to his opinions on the doctrine of free agency." Wonder what his opinions on that important doctrine are. There are various and conflicting opinions on it; according to our view of it, however, we cannot see how the mere permission of a person to do that which he designed and wishes to do, can destroy his free agency.

We now leave the subject; and in conclusion simply remark, that we shall hold to our opinion, until convinced that we are wrong. We are not ashamed to own to that weakness—if indeed it may be called a weakness—which recognizes the Providence of God in every transpiring event. It is our greatest comfort and encouragement that we are beneath the governance of a Being without whose permission a "sparrow does not fall to the ground," and who in His wisdom and goodness—bringeth light out of darkness, and maketh crooked things straight. Deprive us of this belief and we shall give up every hope of Africa's recuperation; deprive us of this belief and we shall be extremely loth to make another effort to promote the amelioration of our condition as a race. Notwithstanding the cruel avarice to which, for centuries, poor Africa has been victim—the chains stripes and torments—the slavery infamy and misery which her descendants have been made to suffer by wicked men, under the influence of Satan, there is a bound in the inscrutable purposes of the Almighty, beyond which Satan cannot pass—an insurmountable barrier upon which is inscribed in imperishable characters, "HITHERTO SHALT THOU COME AND NO FURTHER."

"Yes, Ethiopia, ye shall stretch
Her bleeding hand abroad,
Her cry of agony shall reach
The burning throne of God,

The tyrants yoke from off her neck,
His fetters from her soul
The mighty hand of God shall break,
And spurn their vile control"

This is our comfort, this is our consolation, this is our encouragement,

PERHAPS A SLAVER—We learn from Commander Cooper of the Govt Schooner "Lark," recently from Cape Mount, that an American vessel of decidedly suspicious appearance, had been seen hovering about Mannah and Grand Cape Mount for several days. She landed in that neighborhood some Rum and Tobacco, and one of her crew—a native of Gorea. From this man no satisfactory information in regard to the legitimate character of the vessel could be elicited. The Captain gave out that he proposed visiting Monrovia, and some other points on the leeward coast, and would return in about three months. He has not made his appearance here. The vessel is doubtless of very questionable character, and should be closely watched. Where are all the American Cruisers?

It is said that the native chiefs of Gallinas and Mannah, and even Prince George Cain of Grand Cape Mount, are favorable to a resuscitation of the Slave trade; and that recently they have given some pretty strong indications of this nature. Perhaps they are encouraged in the hope, from the fact, that the visits of vessels of war to those parts are now few and far between. They think John Bull has his hands full in another quarter, and will leave slavers free to prosecute their nefarious trade with impunity. We would say, however, to the "liable gentry" that they are mistaken—and should they venture again upon the forbidden traffic, either John Bull, or the Liberian authorities will be down upon them in good earnest.

GUERILLA IN THE VEY COUNTRY

For several months past the natives in the vicinity of Cape Mount have been engaged in guerilla warfare of a very sanguinary character. Farforney and George Cain, the former a Golah, the latter a Vey chief seem to have been the principal antagonists.

The Liberian authorities have again and again interposed between these savage combatants; and by threats and entreaties, have, for a while, stayed the ravages of cruel war. Farforney, however, has maintained a sullen obstinacy, and has remained quiet only till an opportunity offered to fall upon his unsuspecting adversary. A few weeks ago with a strong party he attacked one of Prince Cain's towns but was signally beaten back with the loss of one third his force, killed on the ground.

This defeat, it appears, has produced a great revolution in his war propensities; and he now proposes, in good faith he declares—an adjustment of all their disputes and the restoration of peace. And we are glad to learn, by recent intelligence from the Vey country, that the prospects of an effectual settlement of the difficulties are encouraging. A Council of Chiefs for this purpose is now assembled in "Grand Palaver," at Prince Grey's town; and the country people seem sanguine that the result will be favorable—especially in view of the part the government here is taking to encourage an adjustment.

It is very clear, however, that while the authority of this government has succeeded, and may sometimes succeed in deterring the surrounding natives from war and bloodshed; their inherent love of war and plunder can be effectually eradicated only by supernatural agency; the influence of the gospel—of which they are now so deplorably destitute—is the only means of causing them "to beat their swords into plough—shares, their spears into pruning hooks, and to learn war no more."

DIRECTIONS FOR USING BRICK PRESS.

As it regards the working of the Press, oil every part that has friction upon it. The screw must be oiled as far as it will go, which gives the greatest of the pressure; next push back, pull off the lid, then raise the brick by the small lever, a boy places a small board on each edge of the brick; carries it off and lays it flat on the floor, when partly dried they may be placed in piles which will keep them from warping till they are dry enough to handle then rub the hand gently over the edges, and back them over the roof to dry thoroughly for the kiln.—If it is necessary to alter the size of thickness of the brick, it is done by placing washers on the cap in the end of the piston, which will make the bricks thinner—when a kiln is to be set 37 feet or 40 high set the press bricks ten courses from the top, set them edge upon edge 5 to 6 courses high and fill out with common bricks.

In using them the whiter the mortar and thinner the joints, the neater the work will look when finished. In replacing clay for press bricks, it should be put to soak, one day previous to moulding and after tempering as is customary for common bricks it should be tempered a second time to render it perfectly smooth the sand for dusting the mould and rolling the clay in previous to casting it in the moulds should be of the finest kind with little grit as possible through a fine sieve:—when a superfluous quantity of sand is used, it will remain on the brick until pressed and dry, when in rubbing it will fall off and leave so much of an uneven surface. Bricks should be made and kept under sheds and not exposed to the sun as the edges dryes hard and leave the centre moist, consequently presses imperfect—they should have the wetter rough edges rubbed off previous to pressing.

Bricks that are made in the morning are in general ready for pressing next day or when they can be taken from this press without putting out of shape. In case they are in danger of becoming too dry boards may be placed on top or sides or damp cloths placed over them, the more carefully they are handled previous to pressing the more perfect they will be after it.

The clay best adopted for press brick is a lead colour rust inclined to yellow free from gravel and iron ore!!

MAXIMS TO GUIDE A YOUNG MAN.—Keep good company or none.

Never be idle. If your hands cannot be usefully employed, attend to the cultivation of your mind.

Always speak the truth.

Make few promises.

Live up to your engagements.

Have no very intimate friends.

Keep your own secrets, if you have any.

When you speak to a person look him in the face.

Good company and good conversation are the very sinews of virtue.

Good character is above all things else.

Never listen to loose or idle conversation.

You had better be poisoned in your blood than in your principles.

Your character cannot be essentially injured except by your own acts.

If any one speak evil of you, let your life be so virtuous that none will believe him.

Always speak and act in the presence of God.

Drink no intoxicating liquor.

Ever live, misfortune excepted, within your income.

When you retire to bed, think over what you have done during the day.

Never neglect your religion.

Make no haste to be rich if you would prosper.

Small and steady gains give competency with tranquility of mind.

Never play at any kind of game.

Avoid temptation, through the fear that you may not withstand it.

Earn your money before you spend it.

Never run in debt unless you see a way to get out of it again.

Never borrow if you can avoid it.

Be just before you are generous.

Keep yourself innocent if you would be happy.

Save while you are young, to spend when you are old.

Never think that which you do for religion is time or money misspent.

Always go to meeting when you can.

Read some portion of the Bible every day.

Often think of death, and of your accountability to God.

Read over the above maxims at least once a week.—Gazette and Courier.

FAITH.

BY MRS. ANNA L ANGIER.

Faith is an anchor;
Faith is a Shield;
Faith is a Weapon
The weakest may wield;
Faith is an Antidote;
Faith is a Balm;
Faith can the Tyrant
Terror disarm.
Faith is a Comforter;
Faith is a friend;
Faith is a Talisman
Hearts to defend;
Faith is a monarch,
With power to control
Horor and Dread,
When they threaten the soul;
Faith is a Sentinel,
Knowing no fear;
Faith is a watchword,
The drooping to cheer;
Faith is the whisper
Of heavenly voice;
Faith bids us learn
To all things to rejoice;
Faith is an alway,
Where Duty must be laid;
Faith says, in the tempest,
Be not afraid;
Faith is a refuge
From every snare;
Faith nerves us with courage,
The burden to bear;
Faith is a Well-spring
Of peace to the mind;
Faith opens closed lids,
Gives ever to the Blind;
In Faith's gallant Vessel
We sail o'er life's wave;
Faith flings a halo,
Where Hope finds a grave;
Faith is ours for the asking;
Then let none despair;
Faith plucks from the bosom
The arrows of Care;
Faith hits the dark curtain
That covers the tomb,
And Faith's kindly lamp
Enlightens our gloom;
Faith triumphs over all;
Nor is vanquished by Death;
But the grim King of Terror
Is conquered by Faith!
Then pray that the Boon
To each heart may be given;
Till Faith turns to Sight
Mid the glories of Heaven.

THE HAND OF GOD IN THE DESERT.

Bayard Taylor, in his "Journal to Central Africa," thus speaks of the natural beauties of the great Nubian Desert:

I soon fell into a regular daily routine of travel, which, during all my later experiences of the desert, never became monotonous. I arose at dawn every morning, bathed my eyes with a handful of the precious water, and drank a cup of coffee. After the tent had been struck and the camels laden, I walked ahead for two hours often so far in advance that I lost sight and hearing of the caravan. I found an unspeakable fascination in the sublime solitude of the desert. I often beheld the sun rise, when, within the wide ring of the horizon, there was no other living creature to be seen. He came up like a god, in awful glory, and it would have been a natural act, had I cast myself upon the ground and worshipped him. The sudden change in the coloring of the landscape, on his appearance; the lighting up of the dull sand into a warm, golden hue, and the tintings of purple and violet on the distant porphyry hills, was a morning miracle, which I never beheld without awe.—The richness of this coloring made the desert beautiful; it was too brilliant for desolation.—The scenery, so far from depressing, inspired and exhilarated me. I never felt the sensation of physical health and strength in such perfection and was ready to shout from morning till night, from the overflow of happy spirits. The air is an elixir of life, as sweet and pure, and refreshing as that which the first man breathed, on the morning of creation. You inhale the unadulterated elements of the atmosphere, for there are no exhalations from moist earth, vegetable matter, or the smokes and steams which arise from the abodes of men to stain its purity.—This air, even more than its silence and solitude is the secret of such a refreshment to the desert. It is a beautiful illustration of the compensating care of that Providence which leaves none of the waste places of the earth without some atoning glory. Where all the pleasant aspects of nature are wanting, where there is no green thing, no fount for the thirsty lip, scarcely the shadow of a rock to shield the wanderer in the blazing noon—God has exhaled from the wilderness his sweetest and tenderest breath, giving clearness to the eye, strength to the limb and the most joyous exhilaration to the spirits.

THE DEYTH OF RANDOLPH.

Randolph, in fast declining health, reached Philadelphia, writhe he went to take passage from that port. He was too late for the Liverpool packet. He exposed himself to the rude vecacy of the weather, took cold, which aggravated his disease and hastened its fatal termination. He was put to bed—his death-bed—in his lodgings, at the City Hotel. The idiosyncracies which had, of late years especially, marked his demeanor, distinguished the last hours of his life. The sudden bursts of petulance which disease wrung from him; the affectionkindness and tenderness which disease could not wholly take from him; the rambling conversation in the intervals of acute suffering, in some passages, as brilliant as ever—the last gleams of the sinking lamp; the groaning of remorse, which a review of his past life, at the bar of a stern self-judgment, drew from his contrite heart; the fervid prayer; the hesitating hope; the trust qualified by self-condemnation in the Saviour, whose name he professed; the concluding act ere the curtain fell upon the last scene of earth, propped up by pillows, he called witnesses to his confirmation of his will, providing for the freedom, and support of his slaves, and the last conscious words, which fired his eye and braced his sinking frame, as, speaking in this connection, he laid his skeleton hand strongly upon the shoulder of his faithful servant, John, and said with emphasis—'especially for this man." And then—this last charge upon his conscience off—his mind wandered away to the light, and the scenes, and the friend of the early day; and the mutterings of the voice growing gradually fainter as he passed on into the darker shadows of the Dark Valley, the listening guise stood still, and John Randolph, of Roanoke, was numbered with the dead! May 24th, 1833, aged sixty.

They carried him back to his solitary home, and buried him—in death as in life, unsocial and isolated—in the forest of Roanoke. In the soil of the Virginia he loved so well, they laid the corpse of her faithful and devoted son. They left him to rest, after the long fever of his troubled dream of life was over, in an humble and sequestered grave, beneath two stately pines. There let him sleep on! The gloom of their shade, and the melancholy sighing of the wind through their boughs, are fit emblems of the life which was breathed out in sadness and in sorrow.—Baldwin's Party Leaders.

A LETTER OF COLUMBUS.

We lay before our readers a copy of the letter written by Columbus in the year 1502 four years before his death, to the directors of the bank of Genoa, which we are sure will be read with deep interest. If we are not mistaken, it has never been reprinted on this side of the Atlantic, and, although distinctly alluded to by Irving in the Appendix of his life to Columbus, does not appear at length in that work. The letter exhibits new proof of the generous, benevolent nature of the real discoverer, who, when about to embark on his last voyage, turned his eyes affectionately toward his native city, and made a liberal benefaction for its poor.

Columbus's Letter.—Translation from the Spanish language into English, of an autograph letter of Christopher Columbus, dated 2d April, 1502, addressed to the Bank of St. George, at Genoa.

On the out side of the cover in which the letter was found folded, is this inscription—"MDII —Letter of the Lord Admiral, Don Chrisopher Columbus."

ADDRESS OF THE LETTER.

To the Most Noble Gentlemen of the most magnificent Bank of St George.

Most Noble Gentlemen—Although my body is walking here, my heart is always with you.—Our Lord has bestowed on me the greatest blessing, which, since the time of David, he has conferred on any one. The affairs of my enterprise are already brightening up, and would shine yet more did not the darkness of the Government cover them. I return to the Indies in the name of the most Holy Trinity, speedily to return again; and because I am mortal, I have orders to Don Diego, my son, that of all my income, he is to account to you for the tenth of the whole year by year, perpetually, in order to reduce the price of corn, wine, and other provisions. If this tenth part be much accept of it; and if not accept of the good will which I feel towards you. I beg most earnestly to recommend to you my son. Messer Nicolo is acquainted with all my concerns as much as I am myself. I have sent to him a copy of all my privileges and papers, that he may put them in safe custody, and I should be pleased if you saw them.

The King and Queen, my Lords, designed to honor me more than ever.

The Most Holy Trinity guard your most noble persons and increase in dignity of your office.

Done in Seviglia the 2nd April, 1502. The Lord High Admiral of the Ocean, Viceroy and Governor General of the Island of the Terra Firma of Asia and of the Indies of the King and Queen, my lords, and their Captain General of the Seas.

EXTRAORDINARY IMPOSTURE.—A lady in Brooklyn, New York, was recently applied to for charity by a woman who told the deceitful story that her husband was dead, and she had not the means to bury him. The lady to make sure that she was not imposed upon, visited the apartment of the widow, and there saw the coffin of the poor deceased husband, and the widow disconsolately wringing over her ills. The visitor, not wishing to harrass the feelings of the bereaved woman, asked no questions, but leaving a considerable sum of money, immediately departed. After passing two or three blocks, she found that she had lost her handkerchief, and returning hastily, she entered the room without ceremony, and there she saw the poor dead husband sitting up in his coffin, and counting the money she had just left to pay the funeral expenses!

SLEEP.—There is no better description given of the approach of sleep than in one of Leigh Hunt's papers: "It is a delicious movement certainly, that of being nestled in bed and feeling you shall drop gently to sleep. The good is to come, not past; the limbs have just tired enough to render the remaining in one position delightful, the labour of the day is done. A gentle failure of the perceptions creep over you, the spirit of consciousness disengages itself more and with slow and hushing degrees, like a mother detaching her hand from that of her sleeping babe, the mind seems to have a balmy lid closing over it like the eye—'tis closed. The mysterious spirit has taken its airy flight."

THE LATE CZAR.

The Emperor Nicholas may be regarded, perhaps, as the greatest Sovereign of modern times; and few have filled a wider space in the history of the world. With an empire extending from the Baltic to Behring's straits, he ruled two-thirds of the circumference of the habitable globe, and over all those vast territories and races he was known and felt—Throughout that immense region he might be said to be "the State." He was identified with all its interests, moral, social, political and religious. He knew everything military, civil, ecclesiastical. It is not to be wondered at that, to such a labor of thirty years' duration, even his colossal frame and strong brain should at last yield and succumb. With the genius of the Great Frederick in administrative capacity, he had almost the genius of Napoleon for war. His moral and conscientiousness surpassed those of either.

The sudden death of such a man, even in a time of universal peace, might well produce a stir among the crowned heads of Europe. How much greater then must be the dread, the uncertainty, of what may be the consequences under existing circumstance?

A TOTAL WRECK.—On the first of January 1854, a gentleman doing business in New York was worth with what he had invested in business, a hundred and ten thousand dollars. At the same time he was blessed with a lovely and intelligent wife, beautiful and promising children. The first misfortune was the transfer of property to the amount of eighteen thousand dollars to a California dealer, for which not one cent was ever received. The next were two successive robberies, by means of which twenty five thousand dollar were lost. Soon after this, the unfortunate made an investment in real estate to a large amount. The next and crowning misfortune was a trip with his family to Europe. They embarked, on their return, with thirty-eight thousand dollars in goods, on board the steamship Arctic and all shared her luckless fate? In settling up his affairs, his real estate was sold under the hammer at a sacrifice of forty thousand dollars, making the aggregate loss of his property during the year, one hundred and eighteen thousand dollars, eight thousand dollars more than his assets.

FACETIAE.

"Whose pigs are these, my lad?"—"Why, they belong to that there big sow, the e"—"No, I mean, who is their master?"—"Why," again answered the lad, "that little 'un there: he's sure 'un to feight."

TASTE.—"Sir, you would not take me to be twenty?" said a young lady to her partner while dancing the polka, a few evenings ago; "What would you take me for?"—"For better, for worse," replied he.

A WIFE'S RIGHT.—"Wife," said a married man, looking for his boot-jack, after she was in bed, "I have a place for all things, and you ought to know it by this time"—"Yes," replied she, "I ought to know where you keep your late hours, but I don't."

DISTINCTION.—A showman, exhibiting a picture, said, "Ladies and gentlemen, there is Daniel in the den of lions. These are the lions, and that is Daniel, whom you will easily distinguish from the lions by his having a blue cotton umbrella under his arm."

TOO LARGE.—"Is there any danger from the boa constrictor?" said an enormous country farmer, as he drew back from the keeper who handled the creature with coolness. "Not to you sir," replied the man, with a smile, "she never bites, he swallows his victims whole."

HAZY WEATHER.—Menschikoff has published a manifest to the Russian army, assuring the soldiers that the affair at Inkermann was a great advantage to the Czar, and that the only reason they did not see it in that light at the time was, because they stole from the English under cover of a fog, and naturally mist the victory!

MR JEFFERSON'S TEN RULES OF LIFE.—The following rules for practical life were given by Mr. Jefferson, in a letter of advice to his namesake Thomas Jefferson Smith in 1825:

1. Never put off till to-morrow what you can do to-day.
2. Never trouble others for what you can do yourself.
3. Never spend your money before you have it.
4. Never buy what you do not want because it is cheap.
5. Pride costs more than hunger, thirst and cold.
6. We never repent of having eaten too little.
7. Nothing is troublesome that we do willingly.
8. How much pain those evils cost us which never happened.
9. Take things always by their smooth handle.
10. When angry, count ten before you speak; if very angry, count one hundred.

CHEWING TOBACCO IN CHURCH.—The following lines, it is said, were posted up in a church in Massachusetts. We opine that they would not be out of place in some of the churches in our city.

Chewing in church is not precisely the pink of etiquette, especially when one is seated in a carpeted pew, with no spittoon near. But to the poetry:

"Ye chewers of the noxious weed,
Which grows on earth's most cursed sod,
Be pleased to clean your filthy mouth,
Outside the sacred church of God.

Throw out your "plug" and "Cavendish,"
Your "cut," "twist," and "honey dew,"
And not presume to spit upon
The pulpit, aisle, or in the pew."

No nation on earth equals the French in writing memoirs.

NOTICE.

The Citizens of Monrovia are hereby informed that a new effort is about to be made, for the promotion of good morals and religion among the natives in and about our city. Every Sunday at half past two O'clock, religious instruction will be imparted to such natives as may attend, at the Chapel erected for their benefit at Kroo town. All persons wishing well to the cause of African civilization, and Christianization; and desiring the welfare of the heathen around us, are requested to send their native Children and youths regularly. This effort we hope will be the means of securing a better observance of the Lord's day among the natives as well as of increasing their knowledge of the "Common Salvation" purchased for them by Jesus Christ, May the lord help us, as a Christian community, to do our duty with respect to our heathen neghbours. RECANTATION.

WHEREAS in the Liberia Sentinel dated June 2nd 1855 there is published a piece "To the Wide Wide World" !!! in which there are some reflectory prejudicial remarks on the characters of the Executive, Cabinet, and the Hon F. Payne Attorney General, which remarks were made under excitement and heat of political contentions; and whereas those remarks viewed in our cooler moments of reflection and sober judgments are unjust, and injurious to those individuals, and whereas we feel it our duty and are willing to act rightly and justly toward them; therefore;

Resolved that the language held forth in the above named peice charging the Executive and Cabinet as being "the ground work from which emanate chiefly the onesided law prosecutions" reflecting on their characters we consider are injurious and false aspersions.

Resolved that in the above named peice there are several expressions on the character of F. Payne Attorney General such as "Robbing," "Pilfering," "fool," &c &c &c which are injurious and false.

Resolved; that we the undersigned feeling that it is but sheer Justice to the characters of afore said individuals to endeavor to set them right and just where we found them in the public eye, mind, and estimation, do, therefore, by these presents declare that we freely and fully retract without reserve all remarks in the above mentioned peice that go to reflect on the public and private characters of the Executive Cabinet and the Hon F. Payne Attorney General.

Resolved; that whereas we do now retract from all reflectory and injurious remarks upon the character public and private of the above named individuals, Be it known to the "Wide Wide World"!!! that we look upon the above named Individuals as Gentlemen and hope that the public will never think aught the worse of them from anything we have written relative to them.

Resolved that we the undesigned do now offer this as an apology, and a public confession of any wrongs we may have done to any man and especially of all injustice done to the characters of the Executive, Cabinet and Hon F. Payne Attorney General by that Publication.

NEGATIVE RELIGION.

In these latter days of ease from prosecution; a profession of religion may be made, and decent outside may be preserved, without much cost. There is one class of professors, and that by no means a small one, made up of those who have received a religious education; have been trained up to an outward conformity to the precepts of the gospel; who abstain from the open follies and corruptions of the world; but remain quite satisfied with a NEGATIVE RELIGION:

They do not profane the Sabbath.
They do not neglect the ordinances of God's house.
They do not live without a form of prayer.
They do not take the holy name of God in vain.
They do not defraud their neighbour.
They do not neglect the poor and needy.
They do not run a round of giety and folly.
They are not seen on the race ground.
They do not frequent the theatre.
They do not take their place at the card table.
They do not appear in scenes of riot and dissipation.
They are not drunkards.
They are not swearers.
They do not bring up their children without some regard to religion.
They do not cast off the fear of God.

BUT

They do not love him.
They do not experience his love shed abroad in the heart.
They do not enjoy vital heartfelt religion.
They do not give God their hearts.—Southern Baptist.

DIGNITY DOWN.—Rev W. P.——, of Indiana, is a large man of dignified bearing, and when preaching, extremely sensitive to any disturbance, a slight impropriety on the part of the congregation being quite sufficient to throw him off the track.

He had some years ago, in connection with his pastorate a small congregation in the country, to which he preached occasionally, in a private house. The incident here recorded happened at this place, when a small, but select audience was listening to one of [illegible]'s animated and sensible sermons.

As the preacher waxed warm, he observed some mysterious movement among the fairer gender, which attracted his attention away from the sermon. It grew more observable, until discovered, the hostess collecting some livers upon a shovel, and preparing to march with them to an adjoining room. It was late in the afternoon; and by clerical instinct he thought the old woman was about to prepare his supper. He couldn't stand that.

"Stop, sister, stop," said he. "I shall not remain to supper, and you need not trouble yourself to prepare any for me."

"I ain't agoing to," said the old lady, indignantly. "Thar's a woman here got the colic, and we are just bilin' some yarbs for her!"

It was Dr. Cara just at the time, but I couldn't discover any difficulty in believing that all the starch was speedily taken out of that sermon.—South Bap.

THE CORRECTOR CORRECTED

To the Editor of The N. Y. Tribune

SIR: In your paper of to-day you give us a paragraph in an article entitled 'A Correction from "Liberia," having reference to certain statements made in your paper in November last, by Mr. Augustus Washington, of Liberia. Your correspondent anticipated, at the time Mr W.'s letters were published, the present reality—an effort to cover over and essentially the truthful statements contained in those letters. He further feared that even Mr. Washington himself might be induced to give the same a very different meaning; yet we hoped not.

You will recollect that Mr. W. says: "*I "have met with nothing so 'passing strange, as "the fact that no one has made known to the Amer "ican public the sufferings of southern emigrants "after their arrival here. * * * * I am "aware that cannot be done without incurring the "censure of some persons in this country who at "present occupy high official stations; who have "become influential and comparatively wealthy by "conniving at these faults, and FOR THIS have "the full confidence of the agents of the Ameri- "can Colonization Society.*" The person addressed in Philadelphia by Roberts, is in all probability, one of said agents. "*I know that "for my presumption in exposing these wrongs as "the only means of reform, I must fall under the "displeasure of these gentlemen. * * * I "have the hearts and sympathies of the common "people with me—the masses who are poor, whose "letters of complaint have been unnoticed and kept "from the public.*"

Mr. Editor, your knowledge of human nature tells you that one situated as is Mr. Washington—liable to the wealthy appliances of unprincipled persons—would be most likely to be affected thereby. Those truthful statements of his "were given when he had not the full confidence "of the agents of the American Colonization "Society;" he did not "occupy high official sta- "tions;" he had not become "comparatively "wealthy by conniving at these faults;" these, if to be, are in his future—hence his impartial statements. What care I for President Roberts's statement? He is one those who "occupy high official stations," who has become "comparatively wealthy by conniving at "these faults." What of Pinney? He is an interested, soulless party.

Mrs. Morse, a Christian lady of intelligence, who spent some time in Liberia, at present residing with my brother, at Williamsburgh, L. I., in a conversation had with me a few weeks ago, confirmed nearly every essential statement contained in the letters of Washington, affecting the mode of living, general distress, and lack of improvement, which everywhere prevails in Liberia. In the matter of 'rawhides and cat-o'-nine-tails," which Roberts styles "a perfect farce." Mrs. Morse tells me that it is too true She says it is heart-rending to see little urchins, as well as full-grown persons, kick, cuff and beat indiscriminately the natives, as said by Mr. Washington in his letters. How perfectly natural this is! These lords of Africa; they are but apeing the lords who taught them thus, when thus lorded over by their masters in America.

The astonishment created in Liberia by the receipt of Mr. W's letters was confined to a very limited class; those "occupying high official stations," doubtless; no one else was permitted to see them; this class was astonished at his temerity in daring to publish them. Speaking of the parade in general, Mr. Stanhope, a captain trading there, told me, last summer, that he never left Africa, but that he was importuned by numbers begging him to bring them from their misery to America; many, a large proportion of those who have never known anything else but stripes and cruel treatment in that America to which they would fly from this very Golgotha. His account of the place was most unfavorable; he said that it was murderous and depressing.

It is a fact of which your readers may not be aware that it is at most next to impossible for those going from this country to Liberia, ever to return, howsoever much they may desire to do so; it becomes unto them a fetid prison, pregnant with death; no one of them can leave without a passport, which can be obtained only upon certain conditions favoring concealment and joint interest with persons occupying "high official "stations." Why will the American Colonization Society persist in its deceptive efforts! We are not going to Africa!!! The Liberian Government will be abandoned. It cannot exist save by the aid and a reliance upon a society in this country. Will this be sustained? No Liberia will yet be controlled and governed by an European power.

Providence, May 2, 1855.

GEO. T. DOWNING.

N. B.—We have further confirmation of the above facts, in the evidence of Dr. Snowdon, who has just arrived from Africa; he verifies every essential particular of Mr. Washington's letters, so far as they came his under notice. He says that the cat-o'-nine-tails is an indispensable article of furniture in the Republic; that the walls of the Liberian halls are commonly graced therewith. He would not advise even an oppressed American to dwell therein.

DR SNOWDEN.—As we have published the appendix to Mr Downing's letter in which he refers to "evidence" furnished by Dr Snowden in support of his assertions, we have thought it proper also, in justice to the Doctor, to lay the following "correction," found in another number of the Tribune,) before our readers; from which it will be seen that the true statements of the Dr were distorted by Mr Downing to serve his malicious purpose. And may this not be the case also, with the statements which he says he got from Mrs Morse? If he will pervert in one case, is it unreasonable to suppose he will in another? Dr Snowden is expected out next month. ED: LIB HERALD.

To the Editor of The N. Y. Tribune.

SIR: In looking over the last number of Frederick Douglass's Paper, I observed an article from the pen of your Providence correspondent, dated May 2, on the subject of Liberia, to which was attached, as an appendix the following:

"N. B.—We have further confirmation of the above facts in the evidence of Dr. Snowden, who has just arrived from Africa; he verifies every essential particular of Mr. Washington's letters, so far as they came under his notice. He says that the cat-o-nine-tails seem to be an indispensable article of furniture in the Republic; that the walls of the Liberian halls are commonly graced therewith. He would not advise even an oppressed American to dwell therein."

Now, Sir, while I am prepared to say that so far as my experience goes the general tone of Mr. Washington's letters is correct, I am not prepared to indorse the whipping statement, but on the contrary, believe it to be an unintentional exaggeration, and have always said so. I have also said that frequently I have seen in the houses of friends various articles of native manufacture, and among them several Mandingo whips, which were unquestionably articles of curiosity. I never saw them used for any improper purpose.

As to the latter sentence of the paragraph, I have only to say that regarding myself as intimately identified with "oppressed Americans," I intend (partly for that very reason) to return to Liberia at my earliest convenience.

There is enough of wrong and wrong-doing in Liberia to dispense with any exaggeration or misrepresentation, and I can assure your correspondent that he has done both the Liberians and myself a real injustice by the floridity of his imagination.

In conclusion, I would take this opportunity to say to friends generally that while I am ready at all times to give them such information about Liberia as shall be in my power, I do not consider then at liberty to give such statements to the newspapers, in any form—garbled or otherwise.

I. H. SNOWDEN.

Cambridgeport,

For the Liberia Herald.

The time has arrived that the sons of Africa whose eyes are fixed upon the glorious star of Liberty, who pant for deliverance from moral, intellectual and social oppression; and whose lamentations ascend daily to the Father of mercies, the Allpowerful Jehovah to Redeem Africa from the curse of slavery and the demon of paganism; should understand each other and should join heart and hand as one man to accomplish the deliverance of Africa, poor, bleeding, oppressed, down tradden Africa.

Why is it that the few of Africa's sons who feel the spirits of their noble ancestry blazing in their bosoms should suspect each others motives? Why should I pronounce my brother a traitor to his country, a dispiser of the grave of our fathers, because he contends that his father fought and bled for American Liberty and he should enjoy it? Or why should he dispise me because I prefer to give up the struggle against a fearful odds in the camp of our enimies, being dispoiled of our armour, and without the means to discomfit him; and if his equanimity be destroyed by bias attempt to measure arms with him it must be only to reek under the ire of his vindictive vengence; and because I determined rather than exhaust my strength in fruit loss efforts to avenge myself on our adversary to leave him to find his just retribution at the hands of the Judge of all the earth, and return to my inheritance to improve it and spend my time in an inviting field to the moral intellectual and national elevation of my race. Why should any of these things alienate us in feeling? Are we not brethren? is not our cause one, and does not every sympathetic heart throb for our deliverance.?

Who can number the sympathetic tears that have flowed for Africa! Say oh, say my brother African, be you an exile in Europe, Asia or America, are we not brethren and shall we not feel a brother's love?

Be you an enthusiastic abolitionist thundering dreadful denunciations against him who deals in merchandise with the image of his maker I love you; yes; Douglass, Garnett, Ward, et seteri I love you, and I ask of you to regard me as a brother.

Be you a slave in bonds, shackled from head to foot, I love you; you are my mother's son; and be assured that there is one who careth for you and whose ear is ever open to your cry. Yea cry to Jehovah and he will open the hearts of your masters and he will let you go, or He will declare to Pharoah "let my people go—"Fear not; rely on Omnipotence and he will bring you in a way you have not known, he will make darkness light before you and crooked things straight. Say not blood for blood; lift not up the sword, it will perish with you; but cast yourself upon God. Look unto him, and perchance your chains will fall.

Be you a man of letters, or of merit any where under the blue canopy of heaven I love you, Dumas, Ferguson and Smith and all the kindred spirits I love you. But I cant stop here, I love Luther and Howard, Oberlin and Wilberforce a Clarkson a Barke and all the supporters of science and Religion; and especially those who are emphatically benefactors of their race. I love them; we be all brethren, the sons of Adam and Children of Eve and Adams humanity.

I love the patriot, philanthropist and the devoted Missionary through out the world; and I sympathise with the oppressed and distressed in body or mind be he Musulman, Serf, Pagan Papist, or Slave the spacious earth around, they are flesh of my flesh and bone of my bone.

Charge me not then with prejudice to you, because you live in foreign lands my brother Hamites, and I live at home trying to build up the waste places and spread the conquest of civilization and christianity of light and liberty over Africa our father land.

We have come over this side of the mighty deep; we find a plentiful harvest, the harvest is great and the labourers are few and we are commissioned to call unto you; Come over and help us; if you wish to do good as missionaries, come over and help us, if you wish to leave your impress on the age to wipe away the reproach of Africa, if you wish to enjoy liberty and bequeath it to your posterity come over and help us.

And if you wish to prepare yourself for increasing usefulness, by attending the institutions of earning by learning some handy craft do it but dont stay too long when you cannot exercise your talents; for practise makes perfect

It may be, however that some of our race have been raised up in the U. S to figure there but I do not think that it is the duty of any one to persuade another not to come to Liberia—the only balm for American slavery—the hope of Africa and destined to be the boy of the world for we verily believe that when Ethiopia shall have stretched forth her hands unto God that righteousness will cover the earth as the waters cover the face of the great deep and all the earth will rejoice.

Brother Hamite let me exhort you to look to the east, behold "the star." Look above and and angels will direct and God will in His providence lead you hither.

"The star" stands directly over Liberia, and though in condition it may be in a manger, or as some may say in a burial ground. Yet is it safe, and no Herod can destroy it.

Let none of you stumble because African Colonization sprang from Nazareth; some of you say that African Colonization is the child of the south, it is supported by slaveholders, and ask can any good thing come out of the South; can slaveholders do any thing for the good of thir Slaves. We answer, Come and see and come my brother with a true heart without guile."

Buchanan August 10th 1855

For the Liberia Herald

Mr Editor.—

Some weeks ago, I had the pleasure of perusing a copy of "Jack's history and thirteen minor poems," written by—Gibson Esqr. Since then I have been favoured with one of your last numbers, in the columns of which, and over the signature "Africanus," I see some lengthy remarks on the history above refered to. The remarks are pungent and affecting; and must surely, have come from one who had read, but had forgotten the very just and reasonable saying, that

"Whoever expects a faultless peice to see Expects what ne'er was, and what ne'er shall be."

or he would have been less rigid in his remarks.—Of all men's fate, I think, that of the poet is the sternest and less endurable. In order to entertain, please and benefit his readers, he is forced to leave his delightful and charming fire side, his home and his friends, and visit foreign lands; there he must submit to the most rigid ordeal that one is called upon to pass through in the pursuit and acquisition of knowledge, he must clamber over rocks,—fall from precipices,—make his way through thickets, infested by voracious beasts and venemous snakes, down into valleys,—crawl up the mountain's craggy sides at the risk of being deluged by melted lave,—suffer throughout his entire body from intense cold,—be pinched by hunger, weakened by thrist, scorched by heat;—and stand upon the vessel's deck at the hazzard of his life in order to witness the terrifically sublime hurricane and foaming sea,—and endure an hundred other ills known only to himself, and after all

"His labours, grown the critic's prey,
Are swallowed o'er a cup of tea."

This kind of treatment for our pains,—this sweeping away years of research and months of labour by so gentle a moving of the tongue, is what has detered, and what still's forbids many, who wish to appear in public, from putting their thoughts in some tangible form. More of us wish to associate with the fraternity of poets, so that we may charm into sublime silence the less musical part of mankind by our song, and disinherit chaos of his possessions in the minds of Africa's sons; but we are over awed by the critic's decree that.

"For poets, law makes no provision
The wealthy have you in derision."

The Revd Mr Stokes attempted to be a poet once, and did, from the heights of Parnassus, permit some of his pathetic and charming strains to wander, but some colossus stood up and contested his right to invoke the Muses, and said he could not see in what he excelled except it was in the lameness of his feet. Now, as the Revd Stokes was lame in one of his feet, we cannot tell whether the writer had reference to this lameness or that of the feet of his poetry:—The Revd gentleman however was thrown off the track.

But, again, it seems immaterial on what subject one may write, or what mode of writing one may adopt in discussing on a subject, for that moment the public is in possession of your essay let it be ever so rare, some Jubiter arises with his far fetched light to inspect your undertaking and not satisfied with the inspection made by his own light, he calls to his aid seven moons,—and still mistrusting his rigid scrutiny he eclipses, alternately his moons to try whether he will have the same result under their different shades and light

O! unfeeling "Africanus"

"How patiently you hear G. groan!
How glad the case is not your own!

Again Mr Editor, "Africanus" apparently struck with surprise when the poet tells him,

"A squall struck on the ship a mighty swell
When all was asleep but one, and he was well."

asks whether in all your life, you ever heard of a ship at sea having all her crew and passengers asleep but one. I do not regard this as being an isolated case for whoever remembers the loss of the Schr: Ann owned by C. M. Waring and Co must also recollect that she was lost entirely in consequence of every one on board being fast asleep. This we can prove by the mate and one seaman who are still living in this city; should any one doubt this,

Tell those who doubt it most,
They are neither wise nor honest,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek things of which they're fondest
"And if they do reply,
Scorn not to give the lie"

Again, because Poet Gibson speaks of his abilities and literary acquirement with diffidance and modesty, he is accused of egotism. If G's apology be egotism by what name must we call Africanus's confession? We see plainly that

"We all behold with envious eyes
Our equals raised above our size" and when we trim ourselves for public gaze

"Who would not at this crowded show
Stand high himself, keep others low"

This was the case on 'lection day,
When, on a table, three did bray
Just like three asses, seeking fame
At the expense of Rove's name.

Once more Mr Editor, and then I will have finished with my grub-street critic, and, shall in the next place, begin with our Poet; and in doing so, I shall do it in borrowed words; just as the Jack-daw began struting in borrowed feathers, and shall expect just such a drubbing for my meddling as he got by the Peacock for his presumption.

"Africanus" calls our attention more than once to G's grammatical errors, as if he had not done enough by limbing his history and poems. Now, I presume "Africanus" studied from the same grammar that Mr G. did, and if he were asked what is grammar, he would tell us, no doubt, that "English Grammar is the art of reading and writing and speaking the English language correctly". But James Strong Esqr of L. I. says it is no such thing in any one of these particulars; and gives as a proof, the manner in which we learn to speak this language in infancy,—"by imitation." "Penmanship is no part of grammar." We pass over all the first parts of speech, and take the verb,—the part Mr G is said to have misused, and which Goold Brown says is a word that signifies to be, to act, or to be acted upon. The same critic says, "Here the same tautological mode of defining in a circle is observable, as in the case of the noun," and asks Does "I love" signify either to be, to act, or to be acted upon? Again, Mr Lindley Murray in his arrangement of regular and irregular verbs, says, that the verb To be should be in this form.

Present Am, Imp: was Perf: participle Been, but Goold Brown says "Be " was " Been with many other such variations and shifting; as for instance,

Murray—hang hanged hung.
Brown—hang hung hung.

Upon these grounds I think every man should have a right to make his own grammar, for we see that no two grammarians agree as to the true mode of writing the English language correctly. It is hard for one to be obliged to be made in his youthful days, akin to the carcass which Sampson found honey in, to get a knowledge of grammar, and then in old age in order to keep pace with people's fancy be compelled to have their brain liquified in studying another mode of grammar.

Our poet says "who die'st for even I." Africanus, says that expressior is not grammatical—well let us see.

I am a sinner, and Christ died for sinners, therefore he died for I; why should we change the pronoun, as some people term it, and say me a "Pronoun is used in stead of a noun" than why not throw away the noun;—why this superfluous number of times?

Our poet is censured for comparing himself to a "boar" why? I think it is said that the evil spirits that were cast out of certain men went in to the swine, certainly they wished to change a bad place for a better one, for as soon as they entered the swine, they being less sinful and filthy than man could not endure so much wickedness in them, therefore they ran head long into the sea.

Again, he is accused of "making love to a Baboon," "an unsightly creature." We are emphatically told by a certain writer that some of the races of men sprang originally from baboons. After Africanus had kicked up all this dast he gets one side and says to Gibson go on, so say I, and.

Hear an old experienced sinner
Instructing thus a young beginner.
Consult yourself; and if you find
A powerful impulse urge your mind,
Impartial judge within your breast
What subject you can manage best;
Whether your genuis most inclines
To satire, praise, or humorous lines,
To elegies in mournful tone,
Or prologue sent from hand unknown.
* * * * *

To statesmen would you give a wipe,
You print it in italic type
* * * * * * *

Your poem in its modish dress,
Correctly fitted for the press,
Convey by penny post to Lintot
But let no friend alive look into 't
If Lintot thinks it will quit the cost,
You need not fear your labour lost.—
And how agreeably surprised
And you to see it advertised
* * * * *

Be sure at Will's the following day,
Lie snug, and hear what critics say;
And, if you find the general vogue
Pronounces you a stupid rogue,
D'e all your thoughts as low and little
Sit still and swallow down your spittle
For critics have no partial views,
Except they know whom they abuse.
Once more, and then I'm done with G.
I have been, I know, too lengthy—
Be mindful when invention fails
To scratch your head and bite your nails.

For the "Liberia Herald."

Mr Editor:—

I am aware that your paper is not theological in its character, but, presuming that you will grant me a space in your columns for two questions on which I have lately heard some discussion, but with regard to which I am not decided I send them, perhaps some of your learned correspondents may be able to throw some light upon them.

1. Were the fishes of the Sea destroyed in the universal deluge?

2. Are the grounds for believing that the creature which beguiled Eve, in the garden of Eden, was a serpent less numerous and satisfactory, than those upon which Dr Adam Clarke founds his hypothesis that it was of the monkey or oarang-outang species?

Respectfully Yours.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA SEPTEMBER 10, 1855.

LIBERIANS TRADUCED.

The enemies of Liberia are restless, in view of the steady prosperity, which, notwithstanding their malevolent desires, slanders, and evil forebodings, is attending our country; and in violent despair, created by their ill—success in opposing the course of this child of Divine Providence "are having recourse to every possible expedient without reference to its moral character, to advance their unprincipled designs.

We transfer to the columns of our present number, from the New York Tribune, a letter of Geo T. Downing,—a warm antagonist of Liberia and Colonization—relative to certain statements made in Mr Washington's letters which were referred to by President Roberts in a letter to a gentleman in Philadelphia.

It is needless to say that the whole article manifests a most inveterate prejudice against Liberia, and a malicious intention on the part of the writer to injure the reputation, and arrest the influence which this rising Republic—the colored man's true and only home is exerting upon the thinking portion of the colored people in the United States.

Mr Washington, the writer of the letters, to whom allusion is made, has not, as Mr Downing "anticipated," been induced to give the same (letters) a very different meaning;" but he thinks it no more than justice to a whole community, whom his letters, without any intention on his part, have, in many respects, misrepresented, to say, that he wrote his "first impressions," gathered during his acclimating process, before he had acquired by careful, and discriminating observation and reflection, a correct knowledge of things. We have not the least doubt that were Mr W. to write to the United States now on the same subject, he would not reiterate the same things.

Mr Downing brings forward in support of Mr Washington's statements—which he takes for granted are all correct—the testimony of one Mrs Morse whom he calls "a Christian lady of intelligence." This lady may have been in Liberia, but we know nothing of her; nor do we know anything of the time when she emigrated hither. We have made inquiries, but none of the old settlers of whom we have inquired has been able to furnish any definite information respecting her. If Mrs Morse was ever in Liberia it is highly presumable that her stay was transient, and her opportunities for observation limited She probably belonged to that unfortunate class of persons, who, coming to Liberia, expect to find an El-Dorado or Elysium—abounding in all the comforts and conveniences of old and long established communities; and who, when they fail,—as of course they must—to realize their extravagant anticipations, become disheartened and dissatisfied, and return to the United States laden with evil reports concerning this good land.

The next testimony which Mr Downing adduces is that (Mirabile dictu!) of Capt Stanhope—a man of most unenviable notoriety among the people of Liberia, whose authority with them is prima facie ground for discrediting the truthfulness of whatever is related. He is "skilled in the pharmacopoeia of falsehood, and has practiced the art so long that he can tell to a fraction the exact measure of truth, which, to be palatable, every scientifically compounded lie must contain" This man—this notorious Stanhope—told Mr Downing that "he never left Africa but that he was importuned by numbers begging him to bring them from their misery to merica," The "father of lies" could never have concocted a more atrocious mendacity; and doubtless this came from him through his very faithful and active medium Capt Stanhope. There is no man who has lived in Liberia any time, possessing a soul within him, who would not, no matter how circumscribed in material wealth, spurn the idea of returning to the United States to reside, much less would he condescend to the degradation of begging a passage of Capt Stanhope. No; to every colored man—that is a man—the liberty enjoyed in Liberia, "weak and dependent," and isolated from other parts of the world as she is, is infinitely preferable to the privilege of bowing and scraping to a dominant race, though it be done on the fair shores of Columbia.

Near the close of his letter Mr Downing has the following sentences! "Why will the Colonization Society persist in its deceptive efforts." We are not going to Africa, The Liberian government will be abandoned, "&c &c—Mr D. is certainly a wiseacre of wonderful sagacity and foresight; and, judging from the boldness with which he utters his vaticinations, one might be pardoned for coming to the conclusion that he is also among the prophets"—the son of a prophet and the father of prophets. But he exhibits an ignorance of the history and condition of Liberia unpardonable in a man of his intelligence, when he says the "efforts" of the Colonization Society are "deceptive," A little over thirty years ago, the first band of emigrants, about eighty in number, left the United States, for this barbarous coast under the patronage of the American Colonization Society, just then formed, amid persecution abuse and opposition from different quarters. After various unsuccessful attempts to establish themselves, the pioneers obtained a permanent foothold on Cape Messurado.

Their number has since swelled to thousands and they now form a free and independent Republic. Through their influence, the slave trade, the fruitful source of our degradation as a race, has been suppressed for several hundred miles along the coast; while the blessings of the redeeming, elevating, and dignifying religion of the gospel are being felt by many a sable son of the forest. Will Mr Downing in the face of those facts, assert that the "efforts" of the Colonization Soc; are deceptive!" The lasting good which those "efforts" have accomplished are too obvious to tolerate so serious a charge; the benefits that have accrued, and are every day accruing from them, are too evident, to leave in the mind of the fair and candid any doubt as to their philanthropic and unfeigned character. The "deception" is on the side of Mr Downing; he must first emancipate himself from his strong prejudices—rid himself of the tremendous "beam" with which he has voluntarily obstructed his vision with reference to Colonization and Liberia, before he can be prepared to render a correct judgment.

But Mr Downing says further—of himself no doubt; for he is not the exponent of the views and feelings of all the people of the North—We are not going to Africa. Well, this is not surprising, if, as is probable, he is possessed of a spirit which finds a more congenial atmosphere in that house of bondage, under the trammels of the whites, than it would in Africa, where the colored man, standing erect, cringes to no man on account of his complexion; but where, (fortunately perhaps) there are no "flesh pots"—no leeks and onions, "no gold and silver to attract that numerous and enterprising thing whose motto seems to be, "There is no God but Mammon." The people of Liberia do not invite Mr Downing hither; they invite colored men—those possessing a qualification which does not shine very brightly in Mr D. but which is indispensably necessary to a useful residence in Africa—A SOUL. To such they cordially tender their invitations; such they earnestly bid to come home and be free; such they urge to come and assist in building up—and establishing an African Nationality Where such refuse to come then they feel grieved, then they regret that accessions so important and valuable are withheld from this infant Republic, But Mr D. may remain in America—and pursue his accustomed avocation—"a servant of servants." His not coming to Africa will not stop the progress of Liberia; she will continue to go on; nor will his refusal to come arrest the tide of emigration which is setting with increasing force towards these shores. Nor we cannot suffer ourselves to indulge for one moment the idea that the colored people of the North have sunken to such a state of degeneracy as to be dragged, by Mr Downing, and others like himself, in a course which, their judgment as well as long experience, teaches them is impracticable, resultless, and utterly opposed to the end in view.

It may, it is true, require a long time to remove the prejudices against Liberia with which, from persevering misrepresentations, their minds have become imbued; yet from present indications, it is clear that the intelligent and thinking portion of them are not indifferent to their real position and prospects in the United States, and to the superior advantages which Liberia holds out to them as a people. There are many, we are persuaded, who, throwing off their prejudices, will follow the leadings of Providence, and resort hither. Such will find, to their joy and comfort, an asylum of freedom—an extensive field of usefulness—a theatre for the exercise and development of those faculties with which the "Common Father" has endowed all mankind; while those who persist in their oppugnation to the manifest will of Heaven, will remain to be "hewers of wood, and drawers of water", in that land of "most grinding oppression."

DULL TIMES.

Some months ago our advices from abroad informed us of remarkable pecuniary embarrassments in various parts of the commercial world, suspension of labor, stagnation of trade, and the difficulty of procuring the ordinary conveniences of life, consequent on the European war, failure of crops &c. We cannot boast an exemption from these trials; the same state of things prevails among us, with the exception that provisions are as a general thing plentiful.

As regards foreign manufactures (tobacco and powder excepted) our market is well supplied. The barque "Estella" landed here a few weeks ago, a large cargo of bread stuffs, Beef, Pork, Herring, and Mackerel; subsequently, the three masted schooner "Alex Mitchell" of a consignment of Provisions, Tobacco &c which is still in market for sale. Our merchants would not have their hands so full, however, and would not feel so pressed, were it not for the extreme scarcity of money, added to the interruption of the interior trade occasioned by the almost incessant rains which we have had for several months past.

The oldest settler is unable to recall any time when there has been such a pecuniary dearth as the present juncture. The frequent auctions which have been held during the last six months at some of which nearly whole cargoes were sold, have tended, not a little, to aggravate the evil, and to bring about the existing state of things.

But we hope, from the present flattering indications, soon to have propitious weather, when the palm—oil and camwood trade will be revived About the middle of next month businessin every department will likely be in brisk and active operation.

RECANTATION OF THE PEOPLE OF CLAYASH LAND

We cheerfully call the attention of the "Wide wide world," to a full, free, and unequivocal recantation on our first page, made by the people of Clay Ashland, of certain defamatory statements published by them in the "Liberia Sentinel" of June, having reference to certain officers of the Government

It is right, just, and honorable, and to our interest as a small and growing community, that we should, now that the political storm has abated, endeavor, by the rectification of wrongs, and the reparation of injuries committed during the heat of political agitation, to close the breaches that may have been made in the social organization.

We are happy to observe that, notwithstanding the intense excitement which attended the last election and the personal alienations which the character of the contest was calculated to engender, all party strife, jarring and contention have passed away, and peace harmony and quietude now prevail.

THE WINTER OF THE HEART.

Let it never come upon you. Live so that good angels may protect you from this terrible evil—the winter of the heart.

Let no chilling influence freeze up the fountain of sympathy and happiness in its depths no cold curtain settle over its withered hopes, like snow on the faded flowers: no rude blasts of discontent moan and shriek through its desolate chambers.

Your life path may lead you amid trials, which for a time seem utterly to impede your progress and shut out the very light of heaven from your anxious gaze.

Penury may take the place of ease and plenty; your luxurious home may be exchanged for a single, lowly room—the soft couch for the straw pallet—the rich viands for the coarse food of the poor. Summer friends may forsake you, and the unpitying world pass you by with scarcely a look or word of compassion.

You may be forced to toil wearily, steadily to earn a livelihood; you may encounter fraud and the base avarice which would extort the last farthing, till you well nigh turn in disgust from your fellow beings.

Death may sever the dear ties that bind you to earth, and leave you in fearful darkness.—That noble, manly boy, the sole hope of your declining years, may be taken from you, while your spirit clings to him with a wild tenacity, which even the shadow of the tomb cannot wholly subdue.

But amid all these sorrows, do not come to the conclusion that nobody was ever so deeply afflicted as you are, and abandon every sweet anticipation of "better days" in the unknown future.

Do not lose your faith in human excellence, because your confidence has sometimes been betrayed, nor believe that friendship is only a delusion, and love a bright phantom which glides away from your grasp.

Do not think that you are fated to be miserable because you are disappointed in your expectations, and baffled in your pursuits. Do not declare that God has forsaken you, when your way is hedged about with thorns, or repine sinfully when he calls your dear ones to the land beyond the grave

Keep a holy trust in heaven through every trial; bear adversity with fortitude, and look upward in hours of temptation and suffering.—When your locks are white, your eyes dim, and your limbs weary; when your steps falter on the verge of Death's gloomy vale, still retain freshness and buoyancy of spirit which will shield you from the winter of the heart.—Olive Branch.

THE GUARDIAN ANGELS.

BY MRS. S. A. LAKE.

Upon a soft and snowy couch
Two lovely children lay
O'er wearied with the summers heat,
And with their evening's play.

Amid the shrubs and flowers long
In artless glee they roamed
Or by the brooklet's tiny shoal
O'er which the waters foamed.

Their nutshell barques had skimm'd [the tide,
Or by the cascade hurled
Down neath the grass or clusterings weed
Where roots and tendrils coiled.

When twilight cast her misty veil
From off the impatient sky;
And stars in circling billows gleamed
Throughout their caves on high,

Then side by side those sweet babes knelt
Close by their little bed;
And with sweet tones and loving words
Their pure orisons made

Then slumber set his mystic seal,
As gently on each brow,
As if his grim twin brother Death,
Had sought to claim them now.

But from the kingdom of the blest
All pearl and jasper lined,
Two holy guardian angels gleamed
Upon the evening wind.

With hands enclasped and heart (entwined
They, their blest mission fill
And gently guard the innocents,
From every passing ill.

And noiselessly their shadowy wings
Drooped soothingly and fair;
And soft the beams of glory shed,
Above their golden hair.

Throughout the land, miasm stalks,
And with her simoon breath;—
As subtle as the Aconite,
She marks her steps in death.

When through the casements, shel- [tering vines]
Her hissing vapours gleam:
Their trembling wings are all unfurld
To ward the poisoned stream.

And oh if Heaven in kindness gives
The Basilisk his sway;
Those loving guardian angels wait,
To bear their souls away.

Through endless space their shining [forms
Like meteors gild the sky;
To plant those death scathed blossoms [where
The flowers never die.

THE GREAT MEN OF FRANCE—THEIR IRRELIGION.

BY LAMARTINE.

I know not, but certain it is that the nation has an immense progress to make in sentiment though it, if she wishes to remain free. If we look at the characters, compared as regards religious sentiment, of the great nations of Europe, America, even Austria, the advantage is not for us. The great men of other countries live and die on the scene of history, looking up to heaven; our great men appear to live and die, forgetting completely the only idea for which it is worth living and dying,—they live and die looking at the spectator, or at most, at posterity.

Open the history of America, the history of England, and the history of France; read the great lives, the great deaths, the great martyrdoms, the great words at the hour when the ruling thought of life reveals itself in the last words of the dying. But cross the Atlantic, traverse the Channel, come to our times open our annals, and listen to the last words of the great political actors of the drama of our liberty. One would think that God was eclipsed from the soul, that his name was unknown in the language. History will have the air of an atheist, when it recounts to posterity these annihilations, rather than deaths, of celebrated men in the greatest year of France.

Look at Mirabeau on the bed of death.—"Crown me with flowers," said he; "intoxicate me with perfumes. Let me die to the sound of delicious music."

Not a word of God, or of his soul. Sensual ilosopher, he desired only supreme sensualism, a last voluptuousness in his agony. Contemplate Madame Roland, the strong hearted woman of the Revolution, on the cart that conveyed her to death. She looked contemptuously on the besotted people who killed their prophets and sibyls. Not a glance towards heaven. Only one word for the earth she was quitting. —"O Liberty!"

Approaching the dungeon door of the Girondins. Their last night is a banquet; the only hymn, the Marseillaise! Follow Camille Desmoulins to his execution. A cool and indecent pleasantry at the trial, and a long imprecation on the road to the guillotine, were the two last dying thoughts of this dying man on his way to his last tribunal.

Hear Danton on the platform of the scaffold, at the distance of a line from God and eternity. "I have had a good time of it: let me go to sleep!" Then to the executioner, "You will show my head to the people: it is worth the trouble!"

His faith, annihilation; his last sign, vanity. Behold the Frenchman of this latter age.

What must one think of the religious sentiment of a free people, whose great figures seem thus to march in procession to annihilation, and to whom that terrible minister, death, itself recalls neither the threatenings nor promises of God!

The Republic of these men without a God has quickly been stranded. The liberty, won by so much heroism, and by so much genius, has not found in France a conscience to shelter it, a God to avenge it, a people to defend it against that atheism which has been called glory. All ended in a soldier, and some apostate republicans cannot be heroic. When you terrify it bends; when you would buy it, it sells itself. It would be very foolish to immolate itself. Who would take any heed? the people ungrateful, and God non-existent! So finished atheist revolutions.

A NEW PHASE OF ROBBERY.—CHLOROFORM IN THE CARS—A WOMAN IN THE CASE.—We learn the following facts respecting a recent robbery committed on board the cars of the Central Railroad. On Friday last, a young woman took the cars for the West, at a station a short distance beyond Utica. Her baggage was checked for Buffalo. After proceeding a short distance upon the journey, a woman who was a fellow passenger, with an affectionate desire to relieve the loneliness of the young lady, took a seat with her, and became very social. She was in fact quite attentive, and among other marks of familiarity, offered her protege a bottle of smelling salts, which was accepted and used. Soon after inhaling the pungent odor of the vinaigrette, she became powerfully affected by the influence of some suotile soporific agent which it contained, and fell asleep. She remained in this unconscious condition for some time, and on recovering from her stupor, discovered that she had been robbed of her purse, baggage, checks, &c. On arriving at the Clyde station, she made known the facts to the Conductor, and the railroad men made up a sufficient sum to take her on to her destination. This circumstance developes a new and dangerous scheme for the robbery of unsuspecting persons on the railway trains. Doubtless, the famale adept had caused her victim to inhale the vapor of chloroform, and thus had her fully in her power, while she perpetrated the robbery. If they carry their operations to the extent of taking baggage, also, it is still more serious buisness. Let every one be cautious about encoutaging the approaches of plausible strangers on the cars.—Rochester Dem.

DUELLING.—Two mosquitoes one morning met on a leaf in a garden. Both were filled with blood drawn from their last noctural depredations. They were silent and gloomy, cross and savage. One of them ran out his sting and wiped it on his fore leg. The other thrust out his sting, and pointed it toward the first mosquito. This was considered an insult. And so the offended mosquito steps up to the other, and says:

"Did you turn out your sting at me?"

The answer was—"I run out my sting, you can apply it as you choose."

"Sir" says the first, "you are very impertinent."

Answer—"Sir, your remark savours of rascality."

"Ha," exclaimed the other," a downright insult! No gentleman mosquito will submit to such treatment without demanding satisfaction! Draw ,villian, and defend yourself at once!" They rushed together, and running one another through the body, died "honorably."

From the Philadelphia North American, May 2d.

ALLEGED SLAVE PIRACY.—James G. Darnen, the captain of the brig Grey Eagle was arrested in August last' on the charge of taking on board his vessels, at some port of the coast of Africa, 600 negroes with a view to make them slaves, was arraigned yesterday morning, and pleaded not guilty to all the counts in the indictment.

The allegations are, that the Grey Eagle was an American vessel, and owned by George Marsden, Samuel S. Grey, John A. Machado, or by some owner or owners unknown, and that the negroes were taken on board the vessel on the 1st of April, 1854.

The defendant has been in prison ever sience his commitment by the U. S. Commissioner to take his trial. The negroes were landed on the coast of Cuba, and on the arrival of one of the crew at Havana, he gave information to the American consul, who sent the witnesses to New York, with such other information as he was able to procure, in order to secure the arrest of the defendant, who had escaped from Havana, and was believed to be in New York.

The defendant came to Philadelphia, and was shortly afterward arrested by U. S. Marshal Wynkoop and his deputies, at a sailor's boarding house in Penn street. At his hearing before the Commissioner, some five or six witnesses were examined who testified that the defendant was one of the captains of the brig Grey Eagle, and had charge of the vessel on her return voyage from the coast of Africa to a port in the Island of Cuba; that he landed the negroes on the Island of Cuba, near Cardenas, by bribing the officer stationed at that point, and received for his cargo several hundred thousand dollars, which was shared among the owners, officers and crew of the vessel. Several of the counts of the indictment charge the vessel with being a foreign one, but allege the defendant to be a citizen of the United States.

The trial is now going on. The case may eventually turn upon whether the defendant is a citizen of the U. States.

POLITICAL PREACHING.—An anecdote is related of the celebrated [illegible] Wales, a clergyman of Boston at the breaking out of the Revolution.—On being asked why he did not preach on politics sometimes, replied that he had thrown up four breast works behind which he had entrenched himself, neither of which could be forced, and continued, "In the first place I am not understand politics, in the second place you all do, every man and mother's son of you; in the third place you have politics all the week, pray let one day in seven be devoted to religion, in the fourth place I am engaged in a work of infinitely greater importance; give to me any subject to preach of more consequence than the truths I bring to you and I will preach on it the next Sabbath."

THE TITLE OF A COLONIAL BISHOP.—A few weeks since the Revd Dr. Vidal, Bishop of Sierra Leone, died, and the Government offered the See to the Rev. J. W. Weeks Incumbent of St. Thomas, Church Lambeth. The Rev. Gentleman intimated his willingness to accept the appointment upon one condition, namely that his letters patent, should not confer upon him any right or claim to be called "My Lord," as is the case with all the other colonial prelates. This somewhat singular request has been complied with by the Government, and the bishop's designation will be, not "My Lord," or "My Lord Bishop," but "Right Reverend Sir."—London Morning Paper.

BARNUM.—The indefatigable Barnum has just favored the prodigy—loving public of New York with the announcement of a new marvel, i. e. the "Infant Esau, two years old, covered with hair, and has already a full beard and whiskers".—London News.

General Canrobert resigned the command of the French army in the East, in May last. His reasons for this are assigned in the following letter to the Emperor:

"My shattered health no longer allowing me to continue in the chief command, my duty toward my sovereign and my country compels me to ask you to transfer the command of the army to General Pelissier, a skilful and experienced leader.

"The army which I leave him is intact, hardened to war, full of ardour and confidence. I beseech the Emperor to leave me a soldier's place (place de combatant) as commander of a simple division"

To which the Minister of War replied:—

"The Emperor accepts your resignation. He regrets that your health has suffered; he congratulates you upon the sentiment which makes you ask to remain with the army, where you shall have the command, not of a division, but of the corps of General Pelissier.

"Hand over the chief command to that general."

The command was given up to General Pelissier, on the 28th May, accompanied by the following address:—

"Soldiers,—General Pelissier, Commander of the First Corps, assumes from this day, date the chief command of the army in the East. The Emperor by placing at your head a General accustomed to great commands, grown old in war and in the camp, has wished to give you an additional proof of his solicitude, and to prepare still more the successes which, believe me, shortly await your energetic perseverance. In leaving the exalted position where circumstances and the will of the Sovereign had placed me, and where you maintained me in the midst of severe trials by your warlike virtues and that confiding devotion with which you never ceased to honour me, I do not separate myself from you; the happiness of taking a closer share in you glorious fatigues and your noble labours has been granted to me, and it is together, under the skilful and firm guidance of the new Commander-in-Chief, that we will continue to fight for France and for the Emperor.—CANROBERT.—Head quarters, before Sepastopol, May 16."

SILENCE.

There are some thoughts that will no more come upon the soul among rude sounds and harsh labors than dews will fall at mid-day.—There are message-thoughts which come to us from God; there are soul-certainties of God Himself: there are convictions of immortality far deeper than reasonings ever bring—intuitions as it were eye-sight and not deduction. That longing which the soul feels that there should be some voice of God, actual, audible, is never so great as in solitudes of beautiful scenery.—Why will he not speak to us? What need of an everlasting silence! We speak to Him, and and none answers. We pour out our heart's confession; it dies away into the air, and none answers. We yearn and beseech for the food of life, on which the soul of man must feed; whatever we get we get it silently. Minds speak, trees speak, waters speak; human life with mingled inward voices speak; but God never! He is the Great Silence. It was not always so.—In olden days men heard the voice of God. It shall not always be so. That voice will be heard again. I have a firm faith of the future. I shall behold him face to face. I shall hear [illegible] But oh! in the struggle to the [illegible] of duty, and the strife of battle, one [illegible] would be worth all the voices of [illegible] which sang the coming of Christ! Wait, O my soul! Thou art a [illegible] Ask not for blossoms before [illegible] grown; ask not for fruit before [illegible] open.

There are times in the seclusion of the forest, or upon a sequestered lake, or upon a leafy hill top, that one can bear to unbury their dead, behold again their pale faces, unlock old joys of love, and let the specters forth. There are some things which one can think of only once in a great while.

Our solitudes act upon our affections and friendships just as death does. For death draws into the grave not alone the dishonored body but also all those weaknesses of the soul and imperfections which sprang from its alliance with the body, and we see our friends purged from their faults, dressed in the rarest excellencies, and touched with golden glory. Thus, too, is it in separation and solitude of the wilderness. They whom we love rise up in a mellowed remembrance, as a tree stands charmed in a midsummer's moonlight, its broken branches hidden, its unequal boughs all rounded out and softened into symmetry, and the whole glowing with silver light, as if transfigured. Then we entertain thoughts of affection such as might beseem God. We enter into its royalties, and conceive its function, and know that it is the Life of the world, the breath of every holy soul, the atmosphere of the Divine Heart, and the substance of heaven. When the tranquil eye of God looking around, traces that circle within which love wholly prevails, so that all things spring from it, and to live in them always and perfectly, then that circle is heaven and such are the bonds there of.—Independent.

CAPTURE WELL APPLIED.—It is stated that Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, is strongly opposed to temperance. A short time since, Rev Mr. Perkins, of the same denomination, and a member of the order of the "Sons," dined with the Bishop, who, pouring out a glass of wine desired the reverend gentleman to drink with him, whereupon he replied;

"Can't do it, Bishop, 'wine is a mocker."

'Take a glass of brandy then," said the distinguished ecclesiastic.

"Can't do it, Bishop, 'strong drink is raging."

By this time the Bishop, becoming somewhat restive and excited, said to Perkins—

"You'll pass the decanter to the gentleman next to you,"

"No, Bishop, I can't do that, 'woe unto him that puttete the bottle to his neighbor's lips."

What was the peculiar mental condition or moral state of the Bishop at this state of the proceedings, our informant did not state.—Ohio Observer.

NOTICE.

The Citizens of Monrovia are hereby informed that a new effort is about to be made, for the promotion of good morals and religion among the natives in and about our city. Every Sunday at half past two O'clock, religious instruction will be imparted to such natives as may attend, at the Chapel erected for their benefit at Kroo town. All persons wishing well to the cause of African civilization, and Christianization; and desiring the welfare of the heathen around us, are requested to send their native Children and youths regularly. This effort we hope will be the means of securing a better observance of the Lord's day among the natives as well as of increasing their knowledge of the "Common Salvation" purchased for them by Jesus Christ, May the lord help us, as a Christian community, to do our duty with respect to our heathen neghbours. RECANTATION.

WHEREAS in the Liberia Sentinel dated June 2nd 1855 there is published a peice "To the Wide Wide World"!!! in which there are some reflectory prejudicial remarks on the characters of the Executive, Cabinet, and the Hon F. Payne Atorney General, which remarks were made under excitement and heat of political contentions; and whereas these remarks viewed in our cooler moments of reflection and sober judgments are unjust, and injurious to those individuals, and whereas we feel it our duty and are willing to act rightly and justly toward them; therefore;

Resolved that the language held forth in the above named peice charging the Executive and Cabinet as being "the ground work from which emanate chiefly the onesided law prosecutions" reflecting on their characters we consider are injurious and false aspersions.

Resolved that in the above named peice there are several expressions on the character of F. Payne Attorney General such as "Robbing," "Pilfering," "fool," &c &c &c which are injurious and false.

Resolved; that we the undersigned feeling that it is but sheer Justice to the characters of afore said individuals to endeavor to set them right and just where we found them in the public eyes, mind, and estimation, do, therefore, by these presents declare that we freely and fully retract without reserve all remarks in the above mentioned peice that go to reflect on the public and private characters of the Executive Cabinet and the Hon F. Payne Atorney General.

Resolved; that whereas we do now retract from all reflectory and injurious remarks upon the character public and private of the above named individuals. Be it known to the "Wide Wide World"!!! that we look upon the above named Individuals as Gentlemen and hope that the public will never think aught the worse of them from anything we have written relative to them.

Resolved that we the undesigned do now offer this as an apology and a public confession of any wrongs we may have done to any man and especially of all injustice done to the characters of the Executive, Cabinet and Hon F. Payne Atorney General by that Publication.

From Cape Palmas.

Sir:—

Permit me to give you an account of the doings of a few Liberians, at this place on the glorious 26th of July. Determined that a day so memorable in the history of our infant Republic, should not pass by unnoticed, we agreed —that the few of us residents here, should make some effort towards honoring the day—accordingly preparations having been made, the day was ushered in by 12 guns—announcing to the slumbering inhabitants of Harper, the dawn of a nation's natal day. About midday a procession was formed. Mr Chavers being Marshall, Mr H—was the bearer of a beautiful flag made—and presented to us by the patriotic Miss Pauline Hicks of Monrovia. In the procesrion were Messrs Chavers, Brander, Richardson, and Stansbery of old Mesurado,—and others: many of the citizens of this place seemed to enter warmly with us unto our jollification.

"The "lone star and stripes" floated in the gentle zephyrs above the Methodist Seminary,—to the roof of which the staff was nailed—until old sol had well—nigh dipped himself in the blue waters of the west. A dinner gotten up in excellent style—was served to a lively and interesting company.

Revd J. S. Payne & J. W. Harland, also J. B. Philips Esqr & Mr F. Lewis participated in the enjoyment of the day. We were much pleased, Mr. Editor with the appearance of things on the 26th. The sociability of the citizens of this place discovered vast improvement upon what it was in by gone days toward the people of our Republic. This state of things is encouraging; and is, to our mind, indicative of an approach of better times. The day is not far distant when from Mesurado's verdant peak, to Palmas rock capped brow the "Lone star and stripes" will wave in refulgent glory.

Yrs truly

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE—By a recent decision in one of the superior law courts in New York, it has been laid down that the Prohibitory Act only prohibited the sale of liquors of domestic manufacture. The next morning all the stores displayed signs certifying "none but imported liquors sold here." The New York Herald says on this:—"The enterprise displayed by the liquor dealers in disposing of their American liquor in one night, and filling their shops with imported liquor by next morning, is certainly very extraordinary, and merits public notice."

In New York on Saturday, June 30th, the heat was intense. Upwards of a dozen deaths took place by sun strokes.

HAYTIENS IN PARIS—A party of colored men, dressed in the newest style of Parisian fashion, are now visiting Paris These gentlemen are functionaries of his Imperial Majesty Faustin 1., better known as Solouque. Among them are General Count Eloa, Senator, Grand Chancellor of the Empire—of Hayti; Viscount Elon his son; Baron Simon, Senator; and the Count de Val, Senator. London News.

The New York Herald declares that "nine-tenths of the brandy and wine" sold in that city "should be spilt into the East River"—and that it is a vile compound of poisons, in which camphine and other deadly drugs are mixed with vinegar and currant wine—the whole being sold with authentic French and other foreign labels!

And this is the compound, a free imbibition which constitutes one of the peculiar privileges of fashionable society! No wonder that when Death rides on such a horse, Hell follows after

EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE

By the late arrival of the British Mail Steamer, from Europe, we were put in receipt of English papers to the 25th of August.

From the Seat of War there is noexciting intelligence. With the exception of a few skirmishes between portions of the Russian and Allied forces nothing has been effected of any importance. since the capture of the Russian strong holds in the Sea of Azoff.

About this time last year, when the Allied armies, consisting of thousands of brave and efficient soldiers, first made their appearance on the Crimean shores—and particularly, after they had achieved the brilliant victories of Alma, Balaclava and Inkerman, we were sanguine that it would not be long before the Union Jack and Tricolored banner would wave in triumph over the great fortress of Sebastopol. We did not imagine that the defect in the system of British warfare,—occasioned by years of peaceful habits—was so great as to occasion such a dilatoriness as has taken place. It is now impossible to augur when, and how the siege of Sebastopol will terminate. It is said that like the Greeks at the beleaguring of Troy, the besiegers have constructed small towns of their own, en attendant the capture of the hitherto impregnable city.

A correspondent of the London Times relates the following anecdote illustrative of the uncertainty, and [illegible] of the operations of the Allies "I heard, a few days ago, from a French officer of rank, that General Pelissier—commander of the forces—being asked when offensive would be again resumed said. "Well [illegible] now, the Russians are losing every day 200 men by sickness, If we wait a week we will have lost a brigade; if we wait a month they will have a corps d'armee."

THE BALTIC—After long waiting the Allies have struck the Russians a severe blow in the Gulf of Findland, which will reverberate from St Petersburg to Moscow. Sveaborg, the second naval fortress in those waters, and the third in the Rusian empire, has been destroyed by the Allied fleets. The loss of the latter in men and materiel is said to be insignificant." Great enthusiasm prevails among the Allies—and the capture of Cronstadt, that most terrible of Russian strongholds in the Baltic, is eagerly anticipated. The London News referring to this success of the Allies says; "As a naval and mari-"time power, Russia is annihilated by the mere "presence of our squadrons in the Baltic and the "Black Sea, and neither her hostile fleets nor her "peaceful merchant vessels dare to show themselves in any sea or ocean of the globe with "the sole exception of the landlocked Caspian."

The most interesting intelligence and the latest which we have received is the visit of Her Britanic Majesty to the dominions of her illustrious Ally, Napoleon 111. The Illustrated London News of August 25, is entirely devoted to descriptions and illustrations of the very magnificent and enthusiastic reception tendered to her Majesty, by the Emperor and his subjects—The News concluding an article on this subject says; "The visit of Napoleon 111, and the Empress Eugenie to London, endeared the one to the judgment, and the other to the affection, of the English people, Queen Victoria's visit will exert a similar influence on the still more excitable feelings of the French; and will long be commemorated by both nations as the most gratifying and splendid incident in their mutual history."

BRITISH PARLIAMENT—Slave Trade—There was a vote in the House of Commons of £12,000 for bounties to British Seamen and for teaptured slaves which led to a conversation, in he course of which Lord Palmerston stated that the slavetrade in Cuba had considerably diminished as compared with its amounts several years ago, though, perhaps not so much as compared with the last two or three years.

North West Passage—A vote of £10,000 por the discovery of the North West Passage—£5000 to Captain McClure, and the other £5000 to other officers and crew of the Investigator—was voted amid general approbation.

Sir C. Wood then moved a vote of £800 to the memory of Sir John Franklin and his crew It was proposed to erect the monument at Greenwich Hospital.

LORD RAGLAN—The body of Lord Raglan late commander of the British forces in the East having been conveyed to England, was interred with great honors.

AMERICAN INTELLIGENCE

From different numbers of the London News we gather the following items of American news; The Prohibitory Liquor Law in the State of New York was the most exciting topic of the day. The public mind seems to have settled upon the conclusion that the whole affair is an unadulterated humbug. In the rural districts, and in some portions of Long Island, the liquor traffic has been generally abandoned or the law is enforced, but in all the large cities it is a dead letter. Wherever the liquor interest is strong enough to resist the enforcement of the law, the authorities seem unwilling to meddle with the dealers. The question, as to the intoxicating properties of lager beer is attracting much attention. The recent seizure of lager at Pough keepire is the more singular as Judge Strong, of that district, has decided that lager beer is not an intoxicating drink.

Political—In political circles the Spanish question, which had revived in the State Department by a speech of Mr Jefferson Davis, Missisipi, was the all—engrossing one. This gentleman is stated to have observed that he would, on the first pretext, raise the standard of the United States in Cuba, and to have expressed an opinion that while all the Powers of Europe were at war was the moment for the work. It is said that, although Mr Marcy, Secretary of the State, had prepared all the documents for settling the relations amicably, the President was in doubt whether to go with him and the North, or with Mr Davis and the South.

RIOT in Kentucky—A very serious conflict between American citizens and foreigners took place at Louisville on the morning of August 7th during which some twenty persons were shot, and twelve buildingswere destroyed by fire, many persons, it is stated, perishing in the flames. After some time the military succeeded in restoring order. The cause of the out break is ascribed to electioneering quarrels.

Slave Trade—Captain James Smith, who was tried and found guilty in the United States American circuit Court of trafficking in slaves, had been sentenced by Judge Ingersoll to pay a fine of 1000 dols and to be imprisoned for twenty months.

CALIFORNIA—A fire had occurred at San Francisco which destroyed property to the amount of 45,000 dollars. The mines are reported as yielding plenty of gold to the diggers in every part of the State and all classes of mines are doing better than they have ever before done in any period. Business was far from being brisk or prosperous; but, in consequence of the reported prosperity of the mines, a better feeling prevailed among the merchants.

CUBA—Nothing new of a political character had occurred. The public mind was entirely tranquil respecting Filibuster movements.

MEXICO—It is stated that Santa Anna and the whole of the capital were in a state of gloom The people are panting for liberty.

HAYTI—Advices from the Haytien Empire to the 29th of June states that a very favorable change had taken place in the islands since the departure of General Count de Dalmarie, who had aspired to the succession of the empire of Soulouque, and with a view to the object had excited a revolutionary movement among the mountaineers; The feeling of the town, however, is so strong in favor of Soulouque, that the demonstration failed, except so far as it produced a total stoppage of trade, which was fast reviving. It is generally reported in Port-au Prince that amicable arrangements will speedily be made with the Spanish part of the island, the effect of which will be to unite the whole under the flag of the Empero. Soulouque.

MARYLAND IN LIBERIA.

We are gratified in being able to record the steady, though quiet progress which this new State is making. We have received, for publication the message of Governor Prout, delivered before the Legislature in August last. This document is interestingly written, and affords a pleasing account of the state of affairs in the Young Republic.—It will appear in our next.

Literature—Russwurm Institute: A correspondent, writing from Harper, informs us that the citizens of Cape Palmas, under a lively and increasing conviction that the safety and prosperity of any Government—especially Republican, depend upon the intelligence of its citizens, are making great efforts for the diffusion of knowledge, and the promotion of literature among themselves. A literary institution denominated "Russwurm Institute" has been organized for purposes of "debate, deliberation and conversaziones." A fine library has been presented to this association by a similar institution in the city of Baltimore. We wish it abundant success.

Judicial Decision—Sometime in May last the English Cutter, "Earl of Liverpool" Capt Geo. Harris being wrecked near Garroway, was plundered by the natives. Among other things they took a chronometer and mariner's compass which they sold to a citizen of Cape Palmas. Capt Harris, having ascertained the whereabouts of his nautical instruments, applied to the purchaser, in order to their recovery; but he, being unwilling to return the articles, the Captain then made application to H. B. M. Consul of this city who, immediately, by an official communication to the authorities of Cape Palmas, urged an interference on their part to secure the return of "British property to its rightful owners." The matter was formally laid before the highest judicial tribunal of the "New Republic," on the ground that citizens of the Common "wealth of Cape Palmas are responsible to their Gov "ernment for acts of wrong and injustice wherever "committed; and that the property in dispute being "obtained by plunder, the purchaser, with a knowl "edge of that fact, had no right to retain it,"—The decision of the Court was, that the "valuables, being of right, the property of British subjects, must be given up."

They have, accordingly, been sent to the British Consul to be returned to their rightful owners.

We invite the attention of our readers to the communication of "A Correspondent" ——— giving an account of the demonstration made by the people of Grand Bassa, during the recent visit of President Roberts to that county, in view of his relinquishment of public life in January next,—to express their satisfaction with, and gratitude for the numerous and able service which, as a statesman, diplomatist, and soldier, he has rendered to Liberia. By his devoted patriotism, his ardent zeal, his self—denying and untiring efforts to advance the interest of their country and to elevate her in the scale of respectability," both at home, and abroad, President Roberts has cultivated the esteem and won the affection of all the people of Liberia,—old and young, male and female. His name, despite the slanders and misrepresentations of his enemies, will descend, green and fragrant with the blessings and prayers of a grateful people, to the latest posterity.

While the enthusiasm of the people of Grand Bassa, on this occasion, was universal and unbounded, it was not unmingled with feelings of sorrow and solemnity in view of the dissolution of the relationship which they have long delighted to maintain with President Roberts. Nor was his Excellency free from such feelings. He is not a stranger to roars of applause—to exuberant expressions of the esteem of the people of Liberia. He is accustomed to behold the happy and delightful countenances of grateful crowds—vying with each other to bestow upon him merited honors, but he had never met his fellow citizens, at any previous demonstration, under exactly the same circumstances. At no former manifestation of popular feeling, had he been called to bid fare-well. The circumstances were peculiar; the occasion was solemn. It is no wonder that while the speaker addressed him at Buchanan (as we are informed by a correspondent) his Excellency was seen to shed tears; he evidently felt the importance of the crisis which is approaching in the political history of Liberia. May a wise and understanding heart be given to his successor!

Disaster at the Gambia.—The abolition of domestic slavery among the natives on this part of the coast is not easy to be effected, The slave trade between them and foreigners may be, and has been suppressed. Slavers, owing to the vigilance of men—of war, and the authority of the British and Liberian Governments are deterred from prosecuting their nefarious traffic; but no foreign influence, apart from that exerted by Christianity, can eradicate the evil of the domestic slave trade, carried on in the interior. And we are the more convinced of this as we notice the determined hostility, with which the aborigines regard any attempt to bring about a reformation in this particular. This is illustrated by the recent catastrophe at the Gambia,—the great destruction of property and sacrifice of human life, which grew out of an effort, on the part of the authorties of that place to interfere with the "domestic institution" An account of the unfortunate affair, taken from the "New Era" may be found on our fourth page.

We republish the recantation of the people of City-Ashland by the request of the Attorney General.

Mr Herald

The citizens of Edina being fully satisfied that His Excellency J. J. Roberts had justly merited all the honor that could be bestowed upon him by them; and feeling that they ought to give some visible demonstration of the gratitude due to him for the many services which he has rendered this government, during his administration, resolved to set apart Wednesday the 1st Sept in honor to His Excellency and that he be notified to that effect, and respectfully solicited to participate in the festivities of the day.

The notice and invitation having been extended and favorably responded to by His Excellency, the citizens generally the Literary institution (Young Men's) and ladies were busily engaged in making preparations for his reception and entertainment.

The morning at length arrived and the grateful hearts of the citizens of Liberia were filled with lively emotions of joy as the roar of canon announced that Sol had peeped from behind the Eastern horizon to shed forth his brightest rays upon the day on which they delighted to honor his Excellency J. J. R.

By the ladies two arches were erected in good taste, (for little ornaments ladies beat all creation) one at Howard's corner on 1st St and the other at Merchants corner on 3rd St. The young Misses prepared a garland of flowers to be suspended by two of their number for his excellency to pass through after being received at the wharf of Thomas Moore Esqr.

At 1 o'clock. The President and members of the Town Council,—the young men's literary institution and a number of respectable citizens repaired to the wharf of Thomas Moore Esqr to await the arrival of his excellency. Cannon roared while his excellency accompanied by his honor S. A. Benson crossed the river from Buchanan to Edina.

On his arrival at the wharf, the following address was delivered in behalf of the young men's literary institution and citizens generally, by a gentleman of our acquaintance.

"Sir:

I have the honor in behalf of the Young's Men's Literary Institution and the citizens of Edina generally to welcome your Excellency into our Township and could only wish that I had the ability to do that justice to the occasion that it demands.

When we retrospect the past history of Liberia at least for the long period of Fourteen years under your administration first as Governor of the colony, and then as President of the Republic, and notice that during that period, notwithstanding the difficulties growing out of our peculiar circumstances, Liberia has steadily advanced and to day far exceeds the most sanguine expectations of all her friends; we feel truly grateful to the Arbiter of all good and to you as his instrument.

The enemies of Liberia soon after the new organization predicted her early downfall regarding the man of color as being incapable of, self government; and why? Was it that the colored race, because differing in complexion from the Anglo Saxon were an inferior order of beings? This could not be, since Divine Revelation positively declares that "God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth." Then why? We presume the only reason that can justly be assigned is that they had only known the man of color, as degraded in the hand of his exile and ever associate degradations with the race.

How cruel! how unjust! after oppressing and confining the minds of men under the iron pressure of unequal laws—after depriving men of every means of intellectual developement to pronounce them insusceptible of improvement or self government.

But thanks be to kind Heaven a star has arisen in the east; the star of freedom; and we feel proud that the foul stain of infamy has been removed, and we have before us one, even Joseph Jenkins Roberts a descendent of down trodden Africa, whom we delight to honor as the Father of his country.

Now sir: In welcoming you into our Township we beg leave to say in the first place, that we as citizens of Edina truly appreciate the many services you have rendered this Government during your administration and are fully satisfied of the conscientiousness with which you have performed them.

2 We are fully persuaded that in discharging your duty, you have been prompted by the purest principles of patriotism.

3 That to you and your memory we owe eternal gratitude for the honor done to your country—your race,—and yourself, whether in the executive, hall—on the field of battle—at home or abroad never proving recreant to the important trust imposed upon you.

4 The Literary institution feels truly gratified to know that Liberia's chief delight to encourage education and industry and has for them laid a worthy example, which they would most gladly imitate, and shall feel proud if they can only follow in the footsteps of one so worthy as your excellency.

And now sir as you must in a few months retire from public to private life,—allow us today to assure you that by us you will be ever honored and respected, and when you shall have been gathered to your fathers. May our children fondly cherish the memory of our highly esteemed and honored J. J. Roberts. Our own Liberia's "Washington."

Sir, we speak the earnest feelings of true hearted Liberians.

May the blessing of God attend your efforts that in private, as in public life, you may be eminently useful to your fellow citizens, and when we call for you may we meet a hearty response."

To the address His Excellency responded in his happiest style—He said that it was truly gratifying to him to meet so many of his fellow citizens, who had come forth to meet him in demonstration of their approval of his conduct and acts during his administration—that he could not say that he had done much; but that he had done all that he could, and that in the performance of his duty, he had had the best interest of Liberia his only home in view—He felt that he had been well sustained by the citizens of Bassa who had extended to him their suffrages for so long a period, hoped that they would ever continue united for the promotion of Liberia's weal &c &c &c &c &c

The following Preamble and Resolutions, were afterwards read by Mr Z. B. Roberts in behalf of the Young Men's literary institutions

President Roberts:

Our attention having been called to your most interesting and encourageing address, we beg leave to present your Excellency, with a few Resolutions, as a mark of respect to show our gratitude to you for the honor which you have reflected upon the colored race, during the time of your most serene administration, as President of the Republic of Liberia.

Resolved—That the thanks and approbation of the Young Men's Reading and Debating school of Edina be tendered to his Excellency J. J. Roberts for the encouragements which he has ever offered to literary operations, and the encouragements held out in his very comprehensive address of to day.

Resolved That the name of J. J. Roberts be immortalized by this Lyceum of which he is hereby constituted an honorary member.

Resolved That a copy of the above resolutions be forwarded to the "Liberia Herald" for publication.

His Excellency was then escorted, by the Town Council, Young Men's institution, citizens &c &c with martial music, preceded by some young Misses leaving the garland of flowers up to the residence of J. H Cheeseman; this elevated spot being admirably suited to such entertainments; here we had a "feast of reason and a flow of soul," until the hour ½ past 2 P. M. arrived, when we were summoned. to discuss to merits of a well served up table,—here we had many of the good things of earth which we did not fail to do justice to as might well be expected.

After attending first to the substantials, and then to the delicacies, we were richly entertained with appropriate sentiments, by Hon: Chas: Henry, J. Hanson, His Ex J. J. Roberts, Hon S A. Benson, Thomas Moore Esqr Mr Z. B. Roberts &c &c

After Dinner (5½ O'clock P. M.) His Excellency J. J. Roberts was escorted to the wharf by the Young Gentlemen, and a number of the citizens where he took an affectionate leave of us, never expecting to visit us again in an official capacity as President of the Republic, expecting in a few months to give place to his successor Hon S. A. Benson in whose hands he believed the interest of Liberia would be safe.

A loud roar of cannon, announced his departure, as the boat pushed off from the wharf.

The Ladies of Edina acted well their part and have our best wishes for their health and prosperity.

A CORRESPONDENT.

ADDRESS DELIVERED TO HIS EXCELLENCY J. J. ROBERTS, IN BEHALF OF THE YOUNG MEN'S LITERARY ASSOCIATION OF BUCHANAN BY C. A. PITMAN

Honored Sir,

In behalf of the "Young Men Literary Association," of this City which I have the honor on this occasion to represent, do I address your Excellency to express to your Sir, the sincerest thanks of grateful hearts, for the able, patriotic, and skillful manner, with which you have directed and conducted our little Barque of State through many "tempestuous seas," and today have moored her safe in the haven of political sereurity, comfort and independence.

We deem it unnecessary on this occasion, even were we able, to follow you through your brilliant public career; even from the 3rd of Sept: 1841, when you first assumed the reins of Government as Governor of the Common Wealth of Liberia, even unto the present now. When the great experiment was about to be made, whether the Colored Man is capable of self Government; when the civilized world looked toward the Western Coast of Africa with intense anxiety, and in breathless suspense to learn the result; in those times of difficulties severe,—in those times which "tried men's souls,"—what your services were, we as Liberians know; may they are not hidfrom the civilized world, I say sir that it is annecessary that I go as far back, and follow you through the long series of years which have intervened. But suffice it to say that in good faith you have redeemed all pledges to the Common Wealth then by you made. "BUT THUS FAR" said you after in true nobleness of soul, you had acknowledged your incompetency to hold such important trusts, (when about to take the Gubernatorial chair) "thus far I pledge myself, that as long as I am intrusted with the affairs of this Common Wealth I will do my best." Fellow Citizens the patriot has done his best; he could do no more. These facts Sir as I have before said are known to your Constituents, and knowing them, we will remember them tell of,—yea hand them down as rich legacies to generations yet unborn, Yes Sir peeping through the vista of futurity, me thinks I see unnumbered millions rising to call you blessed for such deeds. But if one portion of your public life may be said to have shone more briliantly than another, it is that dating from the ever memorable 1847, the year which gave Liberia, as a nation, birth; from that date for eight years by the free and voluntary suffrages of your fellow Citizens, (free Liberians,) given from a thorough conviction of your wisdom integrity and love of country, have you heroically stood at the helm of our affairs. You have stood by us the firm advocate of our rights, the defender of our sacred liberties. When our political horizon has seemed black with sudden destruction; or when the frail Barque had, as it were, well nigh foundered, and our much cheerished institutions crumbled forever,—under your wise administration Sir, Liberia has been saved. Liberia has ever found in you a friend indeed for you have been nigh in need. When rumors of war have been abroad in the land, our peaceful hours threatened by the savage foe, and our hearts have been made to quake for fear,—You sir with undaunted courage have girded your sword in defence of justice and liberty, boldly headed the army in the cause of humanity, and as a mark of the appreciation of your services by your fellow citizens, never have you called upon them in vain,—no sir never have you been denied; never have we flinched when the gallant Joseph J. R. has led us to certain victories. As a soldier you have rendered services to your country, worthy immortal honors, and undying fame. Has the majesty, the dignity, of our laws been questioned, and by base slander has any assayed to cast a stigma upon them as un worthy of notice; You have confuted them with a skill worthy of a diplomatist, and to day they stand out in bold releif as bright as the star under which they are administered, an admiration to the world. Has the lone star, the insignia of Liberia's nationality, the beacon to the dispersed of our race, been hid by the dubios cloud of political confusion? Have its effulgent rays become dim at any time from the dark shadows of contending factions at home; By your wise administration these clouds have been dispeled, and the glorious beaming forth of that lone star has been seen to cheer the disponding hearts of the Liberians.

You have given a name, you have been the instrument in stamping a character upon Liberia which shall never die, and in doing so have raised for yourself upon the western shores of Africa a monument as lasting and as grand as the Egyptian Pyramids. Yes Sir we are proud to believe that as long as there survives a lover, an admirer of all that is good great, and magnanimous, so long will live the name of Joseph Jenkins Roberts. We will love it ever and respect it, and teach our children the same. It will be the delightful task of the mother and her highest pride to teach her infant charge to lisp J. J. R. Aside from your many valuable services rendered to the country, the many proofs you have given for, and interest in, literature, the encouragements you have ever given, and the interest you have ever evinced, for the welfare of the Young Men of Liberia,—in their moral intellectual advancement, conspire to justify the Young Men's Literary Association of Buchanan in making this imperfect, but devout demonstration of its gratitude. But lest we weary you, we close by adding that you have faithfully and satisfactorily served your country as its Chief these fourteen years; during which time the crowned heads of Europe have bowed in recognition of the lone star, and acknowledged that Liberia is a nation worthy of notice. But the time approaches—it is upon the wings of the wind, when you will soon voluntarily retire from active public life, and fall back in the ranks of your fellow Citizens to rest in calmness as the illustrious victor.—NOBLE CHIEF; SON OF LIBERTY! True Patriot our first: Retire! Peaceably retire! covered with immortal honors. Go, our hearts are with you, our Prayers will be for you; Go Laurels we this day give you which shall never fade away—even the grateful thanks of a nation of Free Men. Retire in peace with the consoling thought that you have left the country you love in the hands of a son of Liberia who will seek to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, seek the good of Liberia. Then as you retire may your pathway be bestrewed with garlands of roses—a conciousness of having discharged faithfully the duties of your office. May that lone star which you have ever protected from insults and disgrace, continue to shine over you. and by its light guide you and yours in your declining years.

A COPY OF THE RESOLUTIONS ORDERED TO BE PRESENTED TO HIS EXCELLENCY JOSEPH J. ROBERTS BY THE YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION OF BUCHANAN.

As citizens of a free and independent Government, we delight to honour and respect those who are worthy of esteem, more particularly those who have faithfully served and evinced a degree of patriotic ardour not unworthy to be compared with the most self sacrificing patriots on record; As such we regard our most worthy chief magistrate Joseph J. Roberts, whose name we delight to honour, whose memory we will ever revere and perpetuate, unto the latest generation, as being, under the guardian hand of providence, the conductor of our infant state, "through temptesuos seas," in times that tried men's soul's, and has finally succeeded, in finding an harbour, in which our gallant little ship of state may ride in a comparative degree of ease and safety: Therefore it is 1st Resolved by the Young Men's Literary Association of Buchanan, that we regard the wise, efficient, and patriotic administration of the Government by our beloved citizen Joseph J. Roberts, the hearty support he has received from his fellow citizens—and the implicit confidence that they have reposed in his integrity ability and fidelity to discharge the responsible functions of the chief magistracy; and the entire satisfaction he has given them as reflecting upon him and Liberia lasting honours, and is a corroboration of the fact that the coloured man; the African—is capable of self Government, and is one of the strongest arguments in favour of free institutions and a representative Government of which the world can boast.

2nd Resolved That we congratulate ourselves that Liberia though of to day, can boast of one star which shall ever shine in the glorious constellation of this wonderful 19th century.

3rd Resolved That we hereby express our undiminished confidence in the purity and patriotism of His Excellency Joseph J. Roberts who illustrious abroad, beloved at home, has by a long course of services rendered himself to us and will by his voluntary retirement to the walks of private life carry with him the affectionate remembrance of a grateful people.

4th Resolved That we will ever cherish highest degree of respect for the first of Liberia's worthies, the illustrious chief magistrate of the Republic of Liberia, for his unparalleled patriotism and untiring zeal in the promotion of his country's greatest good, whose whole life has been devoted in advancing the interests of Liberia and Liberians, the tried friend of literature, an admirer of the arts and sciences, the christian philanthropist, the pride of proud Liberia.

5th Resolved That as the principles of our Government are such as are approved by heaven, and as the period, for the retirement of our identified father is fast approximating, we do earnestly implore that the propitious guidance of an all wise provideuce may rest upon him, and that his successors may be as zealous respecting the future welfare and prosperity of our country as the illustrious and ever to be remembered Joseph Jenkins Roberts.

6th Resolved That in as much as the civilized world acknowledges his integrity, fidelity, and patriotism, and as all true hearted Liberians must ever regard him as the father of their country—Therefore we, the members of the Young Men's Literary Association of Buchanan in performing this—humble yet sincere mark of respect deem it our indispensable duty.

7th Resolved—that as, a further mark of our esteem and appreciation of the moral worth of J. J. Roberts as a citizen, we do hereby constitute him a life member of this association.

8th Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be presented to His Excellency J. J. Roberts in the name and behalf of this association; that a copy be entered upon the records of the association: and—that a copy be forwarded to the Liberia Herald for publication.

For the Liberia Herald:

Mr Editor:—

If you will allow a space in the columns of your valuable perodical, I will humbly offer a very few and disconnected thoughts for the consideration of, especially the Young Men of our country—Liberia; and before I further proceed in penning those thoughts, suffer me to beg the indulgence of the reading public, and those more especially who may be disposed to scan, with a critic's eye, communications published in your paper; and perhaps ESPECIALLY when signed or writen by "a Young Man." I make no pretensions to writing for the press, and silent would I have now remained; but taking into consideration the relations which the Young Men of this infant republic sustain to it,—I thought it no more nor less than my imperative duty to feebly agitate the subject, of our moral, as well as intellectual improvement, as Young Men. Therefore, Mr Grammar—sharp—eyed—critic whatever errors, may be made whether as it relates to the grammatical construction of the sentences (syntactically) or othographical, as well as errors in punctuation, I trust you will not regard them as errors of the heart, but of the head and "view me not with a critics eye, but pass my imperfections by." If there be any country that I love better than Liberia or Africa, I have yet to be made sensible of the fact, and pointed to that fair clime. This is my home I know of none other but from history and by limited visits,—nay I desire none other, this, and this alone is my home this side Jordan,—As such I feel it my duty as a young man in a young Government to use all my efforts and influence in endeavoring to advance her interest, in aiding in the great work of her moral elevation though insignificant those efforts be. I have been for some time observing the signs of the times with reference to Liberia, I have watched her progress with eagerness and great delight, I have traced her history from the memorable 1847 until now and am prepared and ready to say as did one of the daughters of Liberia "FOR EIGHT YEARS AN AFRICAN REPUBLIC HAS EXISTED AND YET SURVIVES," and here the great and important questions suggests itself one which every young Liberian ought well to consider, viz—Where are the founders of that Republic, do THEY survive do they still live? Yes they live,—but in the memory of their children the Liberians. With very few exceptions, they have passed away and in passing have behind them and to us a glorious government based upon heaven approved—principles. I do not intend, to eulogize,—but simply recur to these facts more properly to direct the mind to that point to which I am aiming, that is the duty of young men to their country; and thus incite them to more vigilant action, by positive facts, viz:—that the founders of our Government are, dead with few exceptions the present supporters must die; yea they are dying and, that others must fill the vacancies thus occasioned. I would here appeal to the good sense of the young men of Liberia. If this duty does not devolve as a "matter of course" upon them and whether well or illy prepared, they have not to assume the weighty responsibilities connected with that duty and in the discharge of these responsibilities reflect honor or eternal disgrace up on the Government, which they will represent.

As light and information advance, as civilization, the arts and sciences spread their wings and are wafted to every quarter of the Globe, and, as the best system of Government better adapted to the promotion of the happiness of man kind and men best filled to administer such Governments, are being discovered and made known—so must the people in whom is vested the power to do and undo elevate and bring down know the state and Policy of the Government, of which they form a part.

ENDURANCE.

"If thou faint in the day of adversity thy strength is small."—Prov. 24 : 10.

Faint not beneath thy burden though it seem
Too heavy for thee, and thy strength is small;
Tho' the fierce raging of the noontide beam
On thy defenceless head untemper'd fall·

Tho' sad and heartsick with the weight of woe,
That to the earth would crush thee—journey on;
What tho' it be with faltering steps and slow,
thou wilt forget the toil when rest is won.

Nay! murmur not, because no kindred heart
May share thy burthen with thee—but alone
Still struggle bravely on, tho' all depart;
Is it so said that "each brust bear his own"?

All have not equally the power to bless;
And of many, few could cheer our lot;
For "the heart knoweth its own bitterness,"
And with its joy a stranger meddleth not.

Then be not faithless, tho' thy soul be dark;
Is not thy Master's seal upon thy brow?
Oft has his presence saved thy sinking bark,
And thinkest thou He will forsake thee now?

Hath he not bid thee cast on him thy care,
Saying He careth for thee? Then arise?
And on thy path, if trod in faith and prayer,
The thorns shall turn to flowers of Paradise.

"BLESSED ARE THEY THAT SOW BESIDE ALL WATERS."

Isaiah 22: 20.

Sow the seed beside all waters!
Scattered with a lavish hand;
Though your eyes see not the springing
Still obey Christ's last command·

Though the soil seem parched and barren,
Though the clouds withhold their rain,
Yet shall God the harvest gather
In abundance from the plain.

"Sown in tears," with joy the reapers
Shall the harvest gather in,
Bearing glorious sheaves to heaven,
Garnered from the fields of sin.

Sow the seed beside all waters!
Wheresoe'er Life's streamlets run;
In eternity's deep channel
They shall mingle into one

By our daily paths of duty,
Where our common lot is cast,
In their wild and starlight beauty,
Many streams are rushing past.

Sow the seed beside these waters!
Oh! it is a holy trust
Thus to bear the precious leaven—
Thus to conquer with the just.—MANDE

DISASTER AT THE GAMBIA.

By the arrival of the mail steamer, on Monday, we received, further particulars from the Gambia, of the disaster to the British troops there on the 19th July as contained in the following letter of our correspondent there, dated 10th August, to whose unremitting attention we are especially indebted:—

"MY DEAR SIR,—I sent you a hasty scrawl on the 31st ult" and as I have some reason to doubt its receipt by you, sit down to give you a narration of events that have taken place in our little spot since my last.

"One of the obsoleted evils of the Gambia is said to be slavery: and an attempt to introduce it has led to the destuction of property, and a sacrifice of many lives.

In the month of May '53, a portion of territory known by the name of Sabbage was ceded to the British Goverment by the King of Conto; resident there were many mandingoes, one of whom seized and carried away a female resiing near Cape St. Mary.

"Upon information being given to the authorties, a warrant was issued for his apprehension. The Queen's Advocate, with a military escort accompained the officers deputed to carry out the letter of the law, simultaneously with the ap prehension of the offender against liberty A body of 2000 of his countrymen appeared for his defence; and, but for the courage and intre pidity of A. B. Fenton, Esq· (Queen's Advocate), who seems to bear about him a charmed body, not one of the party would have escaped the fury of the rebels. They through his instrumentality effected their escape, but not before Lieut. Armstrong had his right arm so brutally chopped that amputation has since tak en place.

"The news of this disastrous affair was quick y communicated to his Excellency, and without any: me being lost, the soldiers in garrison, with as many of the militia as could prudently be spared from the town, left for the scene of action, on the afternoon of the same day, commanded by his Excellency in person. Expectation ran high—bright hopes of success were entertained as they marched onward to quiet tho rage of the contemners of British law.

"They rested at the Cape House that night with hearts elated by the prospect of victory, not one of them.

"Thought that on night so sweet
Such awful morn would rise."

They marched forward to the attack at an early hour of the day, and were proudly pursuing their way, when they were surprised by the enemy, who lay in ambush in every direction. Being overpowered by numbers, they were compelled to make a retreat, after sustaining a loss of 32 killed and 48 wounded.

"Among the wounded were his Excellency Col. O'Connor, Col. Finden, and John Degrigne, Esq. The first received two wounds, one in the arm and the other in the back, from which he is recovering. The second a slight wound in the foot, which ma de him cry out like Richard III., "a horse, a horse!" but alas he had no kingdom to offer for it (his having been burnt the day before by the rebels), and the last so severely that he has since fallen a victim to Mandingo vengeance. His remains were brought in by the colonial steamer Dover, on the morning of the 28th inst, and interred in the cemetery here.

"No sooner was the defeat made known than a gloom overspread the minds of our townsfolk; and distress seemed to make its appearance every where. The number in garrison became augmented, and every one, women not excepted prepared on the defensive. About midnight the tocsin was sounded, and the forenoon of the 18th saw men, women, and children, running in every direction from the Mandingoes, who, it was reported, were coming into the town.

"His Excellency, with the advice of the Council, wrote the governor at Goree, requesting aid, which has since been promply granted, by a force of 280 men·

"In the interim a volunteer corps, consisting of Cesarales and Jolofts, to the number of 300 or more, agreed to scour the country, meet the enemy tete-a-tete, and drive them from their encampments. They asked for no pecuniary remuneration from the colony. Their terms being, whatever they deprived the enemy of should be exclusively their own. To this his Excellency willingly acceded; and they went out and did no little benefit to our cause On the 29th there was an attack between them; and the slaughter on the part of the enemy is said to be great, while on their part there were 2 killed and 17 wounded. The day after this native sally, a man-of-war arrived from Goree with 80 men, and on the 3rd inst. a French steamer brought an increase of 200. His Excellency finding himself in a position to make another sortie, did so on the morning of the 4th most effectually, by burning down the town of Sabbagee, and putting to death almost every individual; there being no outlet for their effecting their escape, they were hewn down as grass beneath the scythe. The sounds of victory were ushered in while we were at service on Sunday morning; and the commotion which it caused can be better imagined than described.

"The amount of plunder has been great; indeed there has been a complete spoiling of the Egyptians. His Excellency still remain at the Cape: what measures he purposes to pursue are yet unknown.—Of this anon."—New Era

WELL ANSWERED.

We clip the following astounding incident from the occasional correspondence of the Evangelical Lutheran. It contains a hint which may be useful to more than one smart young man.

One of our smart ministerial youngsters had a church to dedicate, and wrote to a venerable brother inviting him to preach the sermon on the occasion· He used language something like the following:

"We expect great things of you; load your heaviest piece of artillery, give us a regular 48 pounder; let your shot be heated to the intensest white; ram all down with a handspike, and let there be such a report as will exceed an Alpine avalanche in thundering roar: blow your loudest trumpet; beat your biggest drum, let your steam whistle give out its most piercing scream. The Methodists and Presbyterians have lately had their big guns here, I want one of ours to befired off too·—Now, mind, every one will be on tiptoe, and we shall be disappointed if you do not make a most decided hit. The extent of our collection will depend upon your effort, and if you do not come up to the expectations of the people, we shall not do much. All the lawyers and doctors in town will be there, and you must come well prepared," &c.

The venerable minister answered somewhat after this fashion:

"I never was a soldier, and do not understand artillery tactics; I never blew anything but a tin toy-trumpet, and that only when I was a child; I have not beat a drum since I used to hammer my mother's brass kettle with her rolling pin, and for this I got beat myself; my jaws have grown stiff, and I cannot whistle any more at all, much less do it after the locomotive fashion. I am neither a big gun nor a little gun, though I do sometimes shoot at simple people. You see, then, I am not qualified to perform your service and you must get some other brother to do your firing, drumming, trumpeting, and whistling. I am sure the lawyers and the doctors would be disappointed, for people usually are, where the highest expectations have been cherished; and as, according to your own owning, the collection would be small in consequence, I will not be the cause of it, and hence must decline."

OPINIONS OF EMINENT JURISTS.

That the sale of intoxicating liquors, as well as all others practices, the tendency of which is to endanger the happiness, security, health, and morals of the citizen, may and ought to be legislated against and prohibited, to the extent that human government can consistently prohibit vice, hardly admits of intelligent doubt. Such has been the united testimony of many of the most eminent jurists.

Said Justice Grier, on an occasion after quoting, the family maxim, Salus populi suprema lex,' 'All laws for the restraint or punishment of crime, for the preservation of the public peace, health and morals, are from their very nature, of primary importance, and lie at the foundation of social existence. They are for the preservation of life and liberty, and necessarily compel all laws on subjects of secondary importance, which relate only to property convenience, or luxury, to recede when they come in contact or collision.'

Said the Hon· George Sullivan, of New Hampshire, on one occasion: 'The right of the Legislature of any State to allow its citizens to trade in ardent spirits may well be questioned. To do so is, in my view, morally wrong If the Legislature of a State permits by law a traffic which produces poverty, with all its sufferings, which corrupts, and destroys the health and lives of thousands in the community, they defeat the great and important end for which government was established.'

Said the Hon. Mark Doolittle, of Massachusetts: 'The seal of everlasting reprobation and abhorrence upon this traffic is, that it has no redeeming qualification. It never has done man any good, and from the nature of the case it never can.'

Said the Hon. Mr. Davis, of the same State, in the celebrated cases of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, in the U. States Supreme Court· 'The world has raised its voice against the indiscriminate traffic in wines and spirits, and it seems to me that if health, morals, usefulness and respectability are worthy of public consideration, and merit protection from an insidious foe, the Legislature would be criminally guilty in wholly disregarding a matter of such obvious importance.'

Hon. Mr· Burke, of New Hampshire, on the same occasion, said: 'Nearly the whole civilized world now concedes that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is a crime against society. It is disproved by man, and stands condemned by the great moral Judge of the Universe, whose purity cannot countenance such manifest and admitted wrong. It is an inhuman traffic, a moral crime, that grows blacker and more hideous the more it is contemplated, and the more its horrid effects become visible.

Said Chief Justice Daggett: 'It being admitted that the use of this article is destructive to health, reputation and property, it follows conclusively that those who make and sell it, sin with a high hand against God and the highest interests of their fellow men.'

Saith the Hon, Mr, Frelinghuysen: 'We owe it to our history—to our free institutions—and above all to Him whose benignant providence has so richly blessed us, that we purify our laws. If men will engage in this destructive traffic, if they will stoop to degrade their reason, and reap the wages of iniquity, let them no longer have the law-book for a pillow, nor quiet their consciences by the opiate of a court license.'

Lord Chesterfield, in the British Parliament, over one hundred years ago, uttered upon this subject, that ever memorable sentiment—memorable from the time, the place, and the person by whom it was uttered: 'The number of distillers,' said he, 'should be no argument in their favor. I never heard that a law against theft was repealed or delayed, because thieves were numerous. If these liquors are so delicious, that people are tempted to their ruin, let us secure them from the fatal draught, by bursting the vials that contain them. Let us crush at once these artists in human slaughter, who have reconciled their countrymen to sickness and crime, and have spread over the pitfalls of debauchery such baits as cannot be resisted:

Said our own distinguished Chancellor Walworth, many years since, when reviewing this subject in the light of his clear intellect and moral vision: 'The time will come when reflecting men will as soon be caught poisoning their neighbor's wells, as dealing out to them intoxicating liquors as a beverage.'

Your committee might quote, at any length, similar opinions of eminent jurists and statesmen, all pointing to the one great idea of prohibitory legislation, as the right and highest duty of civil government. Such legislation, in the opinion of your committee, would now grace the statute books of every civilized nation as a bright jewel graces the brow of beauty, were it not that avarice has been so long wedded to appetite, that their offspring have become legion. True Union.

PRESCRIPTIONS FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Young ladies, to be healthy, smart and consequently useful in and after their generation, should observe the following prerequisites; Never cramp or unduly press any portion of your body or limbs with your dress· Wash your skin thoroughly once a week with warm water and soap: wash your feet twice a day, morning and night, with the coldest water you can get; use vegetables freely as a portion of your food; eat but little animal food of any kind; let your suppers be light and quite simple; retire to bed early and rise with the sun; take moderate exercise in the morning air; drink a glass of cold water the first thing in the morning; never drink more than one cup of coffee or tea at a meal, and let that be weak; be at ease an hour or so after eating; let your reading be such as will instruct your intellect and elevate and ennoble your moral and religious sentiments; view novels as your worst enemies; never be without some regular systematic work on hand, to which you can turn your attention at any time to good account: think it no task, but a pleasure, to sew, and if necessary, do many of the kitchen and smoke-house affairs.

If you wish to obtain a finishing education however, we would suggest the following as likely to conduce to that end: Take a great pride in being told that you are pretty: cultivate an undue love for dress—tight, tighter, tightest: accustom yourself to so much pleasure that you are never happy at home; allow yourself to read nothing but novels; study all the accomplishments of life, but none of the utilities; be satisfied to remain in the most profound ignorance of the laws of your health and the mysteries of housekeeping; consider it vulgar and out of taste to go to bed before ten or eleven at night, or to rise before eight or nine in the morning; finally marry for here everything else centres, some "whiskered gentleman about town," whose income is finitisimal compared with his outgo, and if you have not finished, we will give up that we know nothing of the tendencies of an education.

Comment—The young lady, who adopts the first system of rules will rarely need medicine. She who adopts the second will rarely be benefitted by it, however much she may take.—Medical Gazette.

NAPOLEON III—It is often asked why Louis Napoleon styles himself Napoleon III. The reason is obvious. When Napoleon I. abdicated the throne, after the battle of Waterloo, he abdicated in favor of his son the Duke of Reichstadt and King of Rome· Although that Prince never actually reigned, the theory of established Government is, the new King succeeds defacto the moment that the old King dies or vacates his position. The son of Louis xvi. never reigned, but he was recognized by the adherents of the elder branch of the Bourbons as Lewis xvii; and his uncle, who ultimately filled the throne, took the title of Louis xviii. In like manner, the adherents of the Napoleonic dynasty insist that if the Duke of Reichstadt were emperor only for the millionth part of a second, and until the news of his father's abdication could be promulgated, he was for that portion of time, infinitesimal though it were, the defacto emperor of the French by the title of Napoleon II. Thus the present emperor is legally, historically, dynastically Napoleon III. The Duke of Reichstadt, as is well known, died in Vienna at an early age—London News

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

ASTONISHING CURE OF DROPSY.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. David Simpson, of Collingham, dated 4th September, 1854.

To Professor Holloway.

Sir.—It is with great pleasure I have to inform you of a most wonderful cure of that dreadful malady, the Dropsy, effected on my daughter by the use of your invaluable Pills. She had been under medical treatment for a long time without deriving any benefit, although she was tapped twice, and fourteen pounds of water taken from her each time. After suffering very severely for some time, she finally had recourse to your Pills, and in four weeks was completely cured, after every other remedy failed to do her the slightest good. I therefore feel bound to make this statement public for the benefit of similar sufferers.

I remain, Sir, yours obediently.

WONDERFUL CURE OF ASTHMA.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. Joseph Wild, of Hyde, Cheshire, dated the 5th of August, 1854.

To Professor Holloway,

DEAR SIR,—MRS. NEWTON, (a lady well known in this town, residing in Hanover Street,) was afflicted for years with a severe attack of Asthma; difficulty of breathing, and a most violent cough, causing severe pains in her side, particularly whenever she took cold; she tried many remedies, and consulted different individuals, without deriving any benefit. At last she came to me, and I advised her to take your Pills and use your Ointment,—after a few weeks, by perseverance with your remedies, she was considerably better, and by continuing the same, in three months she was perfectly cured.

I remain, Dear Sir, yours faithfully.

LIBERIA HERALD.

For the Liberia Herald.

EXTRAVAGANCES OF LIBERIA.

Mr. Herald,—In reflecting over the subject now to be pointed at, I was reminded of a passage that reads, "let him that is innocent cast the first stone!" The text "Physician heal thyself," is still extant. But all being found guilty before God, does not keep away a given disposition to obey the command to the physician, nor is it any reason why, we should not confess our sins, express our thoughts, speak our own experience, and relate facts, showing forth truth, as to the subject named above, involving so much of the future hope of Liberia. Especially should individuals resolved to "go in peace and sin no more," have all the helps necessary, for deep and pungent repentance, and every clue possible to an extensive reformation. A false view of what are the necessities of life, and an erroneous opinion as to the capability of producing them in Africa, and upon Africa soil, has much to do with present blighting practices. It is possible for a people having all the primary elements of true liberty granted in the constitution governing them, with good and wholesome laws, just, equal, and meeting the immediate demands of good and orderly government, in society affecting them, and still it is possible from arbitrary rules from influences above and below this law to cause them to be bound hand and fost heart and soul in the shackles of a most unrelenting slavery. What is boasted civil and religious freedom, if it is mared by a kind of conventionalism, that stagnates and sets like a mighty mair upon the fountain heads from which they flow, affecting from the highest hair in the head, to the very toe nails of community, and running into every nook and corner of the land.

Mr. Herald, I know that disagreeable truth is heard restlessly, and but few will quietly allow their pleasures to be interfered with, without resentment. Especially do those whose monitary or other interests are effected by remarks tending to diminish in any way the golden or silver stream flowing into their coffers. * * * * * * The Rumseller writhes before the stiring eloquence of the temperance lecturer, how he fears it will hurt his profitable traffic; profitable to him, while it spreads its damning and baneful and unprofitable influences into hundreds of misled and infatuated families, deprived by him of the real necessities, and comforts of life, the difficulties of the tipler is seen, and acknowledged, still unrepented of.

1st. Let us look at the luxuries of the table. This is sarcastically called even by some men here "charity feed, and charity educated Liberia." Most of those unnecessaries if they can be so called, has stolen in upon "us unawares," from a wrong start at the first.—nay even from a kind of necessity. The fact is, we brought the flesh pots of Egypt over to Canaan with us; and our friends has kindly kept them coming in exchange for the commodities of the land all the live long time, to the extent of our wants, and to the sad neglect of the fruits and other yieldings of the soil which we have adopted, and which wrongly educated as we may be, we love above all others. The fostering hands of the Colonization Society in the first sitting up of Liberia, when we were few, and our enemies strong, undertook to feed and clothe Liberians, by finding employment for the Colonist, at least such as had not capacity to enter the traffic, as food was the chief article paid for labor. Even those who removed to farming districts seemed not to think of the productive soil beneath their feet, and took to ... getting, and American provisions was the chief article recieved in payment.

If I have learned and seen correctly, the greater part of the traders profits, were consumed in procuring American provender, such, and only such, as he lived upon on the other side of the Atlantic for his family. Ourselves having learned, our children were thus taught to live upon the food of a strange land, to the neglect, and exclusion of what Africa did and could produce,

CANADA—LIBERIA.

One pact of our vocation, as the servant and journalist of our people, is to search out, develop, and bring to light the awaken Powers—bilities of individuals connected and identified with our hated race. We would lead, defend, and strengthen every noble aspiration and upward movement evinced among the free, that the slave may have the full benefit of such influence. The oppressed of this continent are so intimately and jointly connected each with all, and all with each, that whether we live in Canada or in the States, or in the Islands of the Caribbean Sea, we share in each other's degradation or elevation. We are one people. Whether of mixed or unmixed blood, we are the heirs of a common inheritance. One drop of African blood degrades a gallon of Saxon, and flings the possessor among the outcast and despised. He many live in Canada and call himself a British subject, or in the States and call himself an American citizen; but neither his subjection to Britain, nor his citizenship of the States will save him from being mainly recognized as a colored man, identified with colored people, and a sharer in the common destiny of the colored people. We are evidently to sink or swim together. To cut loose from ourselves is to cut loose with life. A negro is a negro whether east or west of Niagara river. This common identity overmasters all conventional and graphical changes and conditions. Not even the broad Atlantic can separate us from that small band of our brothers who have settled on the west coast of Africa, and are bravely trying the experiment of establishing a free government of themselves and for themselves. In the success or failure of that experiment every colored man on the globe has a direct interest, and must rejoice in its success, or lament in its failure. When it is said that the French nation are incapable of self-government—every Frenchman feels the reproach; and so when it is said that the negro must have a master, that he has no self sustaining power, but when left to himself, falls into vice, crime, ignorance and barbarism, every colored man must feel the reproach, and feel a common interest in repelling the calumny.

Looking thus upon our people as a whole, we feel proud to mention any facts indicating an upward tendency of the race, any fact which contradict and resist the tide of disparagement, now setting heavily against us. For this purpose men and movements are useful. The good and great man redeems the imbecile multitude. Calhoun of South Carolina, Webster of Massachusetts, Clay of Kentucky, gave reputation to their respective States. So, too, wherever a colored man shall distinguish himself, whether in the field of battle, or the field of agriculture, whether in the Art, Science, or Literature, whether in the pulpit, or on the platform, our whole people have a common interest in his achievements.

Some of our friends, who have taken up their abode in Canada, have thought us harsh and unbrotherly towards them. Why they should so think it is difficult to say. The only reason for such a judgment of our feelings has arisen perhaps from the fact that we have never fallen in with the doctrine that emigration from the States to Canada is the great remedy for the evils free colored men suffer in the States. Our being unable to follow Mr. Delany and other leaders in that movement, has never prevented our looking with a friendly eye upon those who have actually taken up their abode in Canada, nor from doing any thing in our power to advance their interests. It was easy for us to see that many of the evils against which we contend here, are supported, if not originated by ourselves, and that those evils would be likely to follow wherever we might take up our abode.

Many of the evils that afflict us here are supported by our own want of self-reliance, self-respect, industry, frugality, morality, and intelligence. Without concerning ourselves about the origin of these evils, it is enough to know that they are thus supported. No emigration is the remedy for them. They will cleave unto us whether we go to Canada or to Liberia, or to the West Indies, and they will depart from us when we become more self-reliant, self-respectful, industrious, frugal, moral, and intelligent. The Anglo-Saxon will no more smile on helplessness and imbecility in the colored man in Canada, than he will do the same thing here. So thinking, we have counselled a moral, rather than a physical emigration.

Nevertheless, as we have before intimated, our spirit travels with our people wherever they go; whether in Canada or Liberia, our heart goes with them, and rejoices in whatever contributes to a favorable change in their relations to their fellow men.

Turning from our people in CANADA to those in LIBERIA, we have as little reason to be ashamed of our race. There can now be little doubt that Liberia is a fixed fact. The Liberians are a people united in loyalty, interest, government, liberty, and patriotism, and as such are creditably working out the problem of the black man's capacity for civilization and for self government. The experiment is not above criticism. It would be strange if it were. Men do not rise from the abyss of bondage and degradation to the summit of human liberty and excellence in a single bound. The craggy sides of the rocky chasm must be scaled and ascended by many a crooked path, and the traveller will often find that he has lost rather than gained ground. We have before us the proceedings attending the retirement of President J. J. Roberts, and the inauguration of Hon. S. A. Benson. The pamphlet containing these interesting proceedings is of itself a subject of curious interest. Printed documents from Liberia, so far as we have hitherto seen, have done little credit to African skill, and less to African accuracy. The pamphlet before us compares favorably with pamphlets printed in Western New York. The main documents contained in this pamphlet, are the address of the retiring President, and the address of the newly inaugurated President. Both addresses are manly and patriotic in tone, and creditable in point of literary talent. It is impossible to think lightly of a colony which appreciates and does homage to such men as Roberts and Benson. Such appreciation and homage bespeaks a people intelligent and virtuous and is a pledge of permanence and prosperity.

Liberia is still in her infancy, and many justly apprehend trouble both from within and from without. She has ignorance and inexperience to embarrass and hinder her progress; party spirit and political ambition, the prophesy of advancement and the precursor of downfall, are in her bosom. Mr. Benson (who seems to be a vigorous and earnest man) will be entitled to the grateful regards of his countrymen, if he shall so govern and control the elements that surround him, as to find at the end of his term of service, the condition of his country as good as he found it. He may find it better; and as a colored man, feeling, as we do, the full force of a common identity, wish it may be so. The presence of such men as Benson, Roberts, Yates, and Crummell, in Liberia, increases and strengthens all favorable probabilities concerning Liberia's future.—Frederick Douglass' Paper.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 3, 1856.

Frederick Douglass.

We take great pleasure in copying from the Colonization Herald an article headed "CANADA—LIBERIA" from the pen of the above named gentleman. His sentiments can but find an echo in the breast of every Liberian who feels as he feels, that our interest is a common interest in whatever clime or country we may be situated; and there are no circumstances on earth that can separate our love and brotherly affection. The colored man however refined—in whatever society—under whatever form of government, is seen through no other shade but the doomed victim of the contumely of the degradation of the race.

We have long heard of Canada and its freedom, yet we have looked nevertheless to it with an eye of jealousy and apprehension as to the existence of all those elements consistent with the spirit of the word. Its proximity to slave holding America, made us doubtful of the influences that would be held out to taint the minds of its inhabitants to similar prejudices against our race—though its growth may not be so exuberant, yet it may be as poisonous in many instances of association.

Liberia affords the only asylum where the man of color can be free. Here, and here only can he feel truly his capacity to govern, as well as to be governed. Upon every occasion of public association, our feelings of sympathy reaches to our brethren who are suffering the most shameful degradation that a christian nation could impose upon a people. No expanse of waters, nor any other barrier however high, can separate our affections from our brethren in America or elsewhere. The colored mans capacity for self-government, and love of civilization is a self-evident fact that cannot be denied.

Liberia stands the challenge of the world for progress, order, and the maintenance of the principles of its Republican institution of government. Some timid has had their fears, and have lived in the unwholesome element of hope and fear; but we, inhabitants of the soil has never had our fears about falling into that awful chasm of political strife—sectionalism—blood-shed, anarchy and rapine that have been the concomitants of other nations of the present age. We have been taught in the school of experience to maintain order—to love our laws—to respect the powers that be as become true and loyal citizens—lovers of their country and its Constitution. It is true, that from our condition in America, which was well known to the Christian world, the idea of our maintaining any form of government, was beyond the remotest expectation of the most liberal minded of those who desired the fact tested.

The constitutional existence of Liberia, when the declaration of her independence was proclaimed, was hailed as a chimera—an idle tale. How can men brought up under the influences of a severe tyrannical despotism—known as slaves of their so called white masters in Virginia and other slave holding States—of no mental culture—penniless—broken in spirit from a long and severe bondage, govern themselves without the special dicta of white men? How will they escape from falling into civil wars, domestic factions and continual intestine commotions, the off-spring of their sordid slavish education? How will they promote unity the only hope of the existence of any form of government however simple? How will they understand to decide in justice the cause of the aggrieved, and by what impulses will they be actuated? How will their laws be enacted? Will they not be as apt to be Republican to-day—Monarchal to-morrow, and then dwindle into the most horrible despotism? What will be the guarantee for the protection of life and property? By what means will they pretend to bring offenders to trial? Will justice be rendered without sale denial or delay? After what manner of form will their officers be apportioned to promote the healthy existence of the government? What will be the character of their mercantile organization? These questions were the panderings of the minds of some who were more eager to speculate upon the improbable existence of the Liberian Republic on account of the cast of its inhabitants—when had they been any portion of the Caucassian race, however degraded their condition—poor their intellect—the most hopeful emotions would have been evinced, solely because the people were white. The white man's sympathy is not with us altogether in a fair exhibition of our faculties for self-government and improvement independent of their immediate counsel and aid, and the identity of this fact has been too often evinced even here in Liberia.

Though in our infancy, we possess worthies whose shades of encouragement are reflected continually around us in their bold struggles to raise the character of their country to eminence and respectability among the enlightened nations of the earth—though the title of ignomy has been so strong against our race, they are geniuses worthy of our veneration and highest esteem. We are confident of our weakness growing out of inexperince in many matters of civil and domestic polity, which serve their purpose well by teaching us to be watchful as well as careful in the management of our interests. The embarrassment we are oftimes thrown into on account of our ignorance, have been in many instances no doubt, a safe guard to our actions, when a more impetuous zeal might lead us into extravagancies and excesses that we would hereafter be called to repent bitterly of. The hopeful tendency of our race from daily manifestations however, is upward, and we have constant evidences of their anxiety to rid themselves of the unsought for garment of political imbecility—and to distinguish themselves in every department of active life that would in the least be the means of elevating the general character of the race. Forsooth we may say, the colored race from their present demonstrations, has undoubtedly gain-sayed the most obdurate minds in opposition to their independent and voluntary prosperity, that their rise is as certain as the existence of earth.

COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. Editor:—In your Herald of the 20th. inst., I noticed a few lines over the signature F. Burns, which are intended, no doubt, as a reply to an article which appeared in your paper of the 6th, inst., over the signature "Africa."

The Revd. Gentleman not only regrets that he had to reply to "Africa," but regards the act of replying as one of great condescension. But is not his evasion of "Africa's" two simple questions, relative to the statement of Bishop Scott, concerning himself and the incapacity for self-management of the M. E. Mission in Liberia, and his consequent tacit endorsement of the Bishop's injudicious remarks, far more condescending and humiliating? I did not expect, in the outset, to be able to grapple, successfully, with "the strongest man on the coast," but wished merely to contrast by-gone days with present times, and to draw out some of our highly favoured men on a subject in which I supposed they were interested, and in the discussion of which I thought they should take some part, but I find that some men are so much the creatures of circumstances that I almost despair awaking them to their true interest "charin I never so wisely." I repeat, I had my doubts, while penning the article, of being able to prejudice many in my favour just now, but I venture to say, the time is not far distant when the subject, now so repugnant to some of the colored Ministers of the M. E. Church in Liberia, will be urged upon them with redoubled force and irresistable power when they will be, no doubt, as anxious to have an "independent Church" as they are now solicitous of a dependent one,—solicitous did I say? They are not solicitous, they know it is an evil, as men they cannot be solicitous for a state of dependency; but they hug the evil to their bosom on account of its concomitant ease, and external comfort.

No man may expect to change at once the modes, customs and habits of any people; and he who undertakes to accomplish such a task only makes himself the victim of ridicule, contumely and revenge; and, in many instances, atones with his life for his rash and injudicious attempt. It is impossible to make two men see alike at once; and though the principles of the one are superior in every way to those of the other, and though such principles be founded upon reason and experience, while the opinions of the other rest merely upon supposition, still, he being tenacious of his long practiced opinions &c., will obstinately resist every argument advanced by his opponent.

Hence the great difficulty we experience in convincing the heathen tribes around us of the superiority of the habits of civilization over those of heathenism. If the aborigines of this Republic could be convinced at once of the gross moral darkness which covers their minds, together with other objectionable traits of character which they evince, a nation would be born in a day among us; our churches would soon be crowded with, Africa's sable sons, and, to our unspeakable joy and satisfaction, we would see Ethiopia's sons coming from "far and her daughters, from the ends of the earth" bringing their offerings to the "Most High."

Take, as examples, men who have set themselves up as beacons and way-marks to enlighten and to instruct their fellow men, and to induct them into things involving their present and their future interests, and you will find them grappling with stern opposition at the very threshold of their labours.

Copernicus, Columbus, and Fulton furnish us with instances of this kind; while the subject of the declaration of our independence gives us a more experienced proof of the great difficulty to be surmounted, in order to cause the opinions of men to flow into a channel different from the one in which they were want to flow; particularly, if the new position does not at first sight present a greater amount of pecuniary interest.

It was contended that if we separated from the American Colonization Society, we would involve ourselves into interminable difficulties, and bring to our borders wretchedness, poverty and disgrace in all their varied and horrid forms, But ask, those men now, who opposed the measure then, whether they are willing to change from what they are now to what they were then, politically, and whether their oppositions were not without the least reasonable grounds.—

As in the case of individuals, so in the case of communities; so with regard to nations, in their [illegible] and political opinions and institutions. Great Britain, and other empires whose Chief is a king, believes a limited Monarchy holds within itself principles more conservative and better adapted to insure a permanent government than can be found in any other form of government; while Republican Governments think they more justly render to every man those rights which primarily belong to him.—So with respect to the Jewish and Christian religions and all other conflicting creeds.

And, because we have said, in these prosperous times, if indeed they are such, when the cosmosing of Liberia's wealth, of the fertility of her soil and of the unbounded resources of her mines is being sung the world over, that, "the mission so long nursed should strive to stand alone" —that we ought to have our own Bishop; and asked Revd. Mr. Burns a couple of simple questions, we are said to be "clothed in sheep's clothing," we are called "saltroons" and many other hard names, to which we can scarcely refrain ourselves from replying, and that too in language equally harsh and trenchant.

I have a name, the publicity of which, if given, will do you no good; and we must look Liberia has grown to so high a state of refinement, or sunken to so low a depth of ignorance that if one expresses a thought, in any wise contrary to the common way of thinking here, he is denounced and called a num skull; but we are not to be driven off the track by such antiquated perversity as this. I shall advert once more to the subject at issue in as concise a manner as possible, and first, we said, the time has come when the Mission so long nursed should strive to stand alone.

2.—That in consideration of J. H. Perry's remark, "whatever connection may subsist between the church in Africa and the church here (in America) one thing is certain, that if a colored man be Bishop, there is virtually a separation." "What has the black man done for Africa?"—We ought to get our own Bishop as quickly as possible, and let this union, which is fraught with so much injustice and hypocrisy and whose primary object it is to lord it over God's heritage, be dissolved at once. Japheth can dwell in the tents of Shem, but Shem should not dwell in his. This does not accord with the principles of friendship, much less with the golden rule "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so to them"—we can never teach the rule of three on such bases.

3. I asked Rev. Mr. Burns, two simple question,—first whether what Bishop Scott said with regard to the Mission here entertained doubts of their being able to manage their own affairs, if left alone, is true; and secondly, whether he endorses the opinion that, "in Liberia there is a degree of deference shown to white men that is not and cannot be shown to colored men."

4.—That several Ministers, who are not dead, preached here without a salary. Of the superiority of their theology I make Liberia to judge.

5—That, the colored Ministers here, are dependent upon the Missionary board in America for their pecuniary sustenance.

6.—That, all our schools are kept in operation by benevolent institutions in America.

7—That, the conference in America acted ungentlemanly and unchristian like in bringing us under public gaze in the manner they have, and, that, if some dozen were set off, the act would be of great benefit to the political government of Liberia. Now "for which of these things are we brought to judgement; for which of them are we condemned?"

Let any candid, unbiased and unprejudiced mind read what some of the members of the M. E. Conference in America said, in regard to the Ministry of that connection in Liberia, and then run over what we have said in expressing our opinions; and, then let him say whether what we have said is as Mr. Burns represents it, "without the least justifying reason."—Well it is hard for him to have to say any thing to the contrary. I would be glad if Revd. Mr. Burns or any of his coadjutors, would point out any error that I have committed in the course of my remarks. He quietly submits to all the insinuations of those men to whom so much defference is shown, tho' they are as corroding as lunar caustic, but blows up into a flame by having too simple question propounded to him by ourselves. Certainly, he has forgotten what the late Rev'd. Mr. Mumford said on a certain occasion.—"thought it was for life time."

Now, in conclusion, I will make a summary statement of all he has said and then leave him to travel on in his old beaten track, and "Frist, he says I must "put off my sheep's clothing." This I will do when he convinces me that I am not an African, until then I must, like himself, wear the wool.

That, were it not that people abroad, (this is the quintessence of all our disagreement among each other,—the greater amount of deference shown to the opinions of people abroad over that shown to the opinions of people at home, (in Liberia) [illegible] far from the contemptuous silence which otherwise we should observe &." To every thinking mind, Mr. Burns has observed not only a contemptuous silence, but a disgraceful one on the subject in hand, by dodging too questions put to him, and by flying off in a tangent from the whole matter and dealing in indecorous language. He has not touched the subject at all. He has let his passion get the better of his judgment. Having said all that I consider necessary upon a subject of so great importance, I submit both this and my former article to the good sense and impartial judgment of Liberians.—The Revd. Gentleman and the whole colored clerical body of the M. E. Missions in Liberia may oppose, but I shall say no more, especially as I have the advantage of them, in writing over the signature of her whose mouth has long been shut, but is now beginning to be opened,—the poor, despised, oppressed and bleeding,

AFRICA.

Monrovia, August 30, 1856.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor,—

Whilst sitting a few evening's ago contemplating the heavens and the works of creation, the thought came to my mind, for whose benefit were these created. Was it for the gratification for the maker of all things? By no means! Was it for the beast that grovel in the dust. No! Well for whom were they made? Why for man the noblest of God's creatures—and yet, Oh yet! how little do we appreciate them. Man who was created with intellectual power seems to care as little about the studies of nature as though he was not born to be lord of the soil. I think it is time that we should be up and a doing, and not be content to set still on the seat do nothing; for we are a people upon whom the eyes of the world are turned and who I well know, thinks that nothing good can come out of Africa. But I know that if the sons, and the daughters of Africa will but turn their attention to the cultivation of their minds, we shall be as a city set upon a hill. Let it not be said that the black man is not endowed with the same susceptibilities of improvement as the white man, I spurn the idea, for we know no superior if we will only improve the talent that is given us. Why may we not boast of our race as well as other nations? England boast of her Wellington, her Palmerston, Russel, and Raglan. France of a Guzot a Thiers and others. American of her Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Webster and Clay. Why may not Liberia boast of her Roberts Benson, Warner, Teage and a Russwurm some of whom are mingled with their mother Earth but whose memory will live in the hearts of their countrymen to the end of their lives? And I would also say to the fair sex, it is time they were on the alert. I am aware that there are many who are fully competent to show to the world that they are not far behind there better half. Why then keep your talent hid? Was it for that purpose it was given you, or was it not for improvement? Then let me urge you to bring it to light, fear not the criticism that may be past upon your efforts. Why may not Liberia boast of her Daughters as well as America does of her Sigourney a Gillman and many others that might be mentioned; and pray how did their names become so renowned? Was it by parentage? No! But by a strict attention to the improvement of the mind, that they laid the foundation for their future greatness. Let it be instilled in the hearts of our children that a tittle is nothing but an empty show that will pass away with them when they cease to live; but if they wish to live after they are dead in the memory of their friends, let them seek to Immortalize their names by improving their talents and leaving fruits of their greatness behind them. I am aware that many parents think it a duty too incumbent to overlook the training of their children and if they can but get them to a school where they may learn to read and wright it is all well; but only think for a moment if you please what a responsibility rest upon you; Your children will have to fill your places upon the stage of action after you have passed away and whether it be done with honor or dishonor, it will be for your countrymen to determine, and oh let it not be a reproach cast upon your shadows that you have not fulfilled the task imposed upon you, but let their lives be such as will call down the blessing of thousand on your heads for the noble example you have set them. For we are fast passing away, and the greatness of this Republic depends entirely upon the rising generation to carry out the principles of their ancestors. Let me advise you one and all, to adopt the language of the wise man "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." Receive these few remarks from one whose desire is to see the prosperity of this Republic. Let integrity of heart actuate every member of this our beloved country. Exercise toward each other feelings of friendship, and the God of Heaven will bless our labour.

Yours FLORELLA.

Robertsport, Sept. 1st, 1856.

To His Excellency
S. A. Benson, President Rep. Liberia.

My Dear Sir,—It gives me much pleasure to inform you, that we anchored here at 10 minutes past 2 P. M., on Sunday after a pleasant run of 6½ hours.

Contrary to the very excited fears of some of our friends at Monrovia, we found the beach so good, that on Monday we landed Fifty-one of our immigrants with a quantity of stores, baggage &c., and yesterday thirty-five more. The weather has been very fine, the anchorage good, and the water so bold that our Ship, large as she is, lays within half a mile of the beach, thus enabling our boats to make a number of trips per day.

I am delighted with the place. There is nothing wanted but men, means, and enterprise, to make it one of the most flourishing commercial Ports in Western Africa, while the fertile soil, the pure, and cool and abundant supply of excellent water, all conspire to make it a most desirable home for our immigrants from the U. S. It ought to be built up and sustained with the utmost energy and zeal.

The accomodations for the new immigrants were ample, but as the floors were only matted, I had plank landed, floors laid on poles cut for the purpose and our people are quite contented and getting settled

As I write by a courier express hired for the purpose, and he walks the beach, and is all ready to start I must refrain from enlarging, I close by subscribing myself.

Respectfully
Your Excellency's
O. t. Servt. and Friend,
JOHN SEYS.
Special Agent A. C. S.

REV. JOHN SEYS. We are happy to learn of the success which attended Mr. Seys' effort in landing the immigrants, stores &c., at Roberts Port. His letter addressed to President Benson, speaks well of the prospects. Mr. Seys is a go-ahead man, full of energy and zeal—every day increases his anxiety—and to use his own words, "push a head" until the work is finished. A man of such enterprising spirit, and christian sympathy for those with whom he is called to associate, as has already marked his character, must be untiring in his efforts to encourge them in voluntary avocations for happiness, as far as possible, and to set such examples of thrift and industry, as will always be a source of pleasing gratification to him when he will have retired from a life of Colonizing activity, to know that he has done his duty. This man is the Rev. John Seys. We knew him in the past, and we believe him to be the same in feeling and principle now—a lover of the African—a friend of Liberia—and a faithful well-wisher of her prosperity. We would here fail to do our duty were we to forget the prompt assistance rendered by Capt. Reid Cooper of the Goverament Schr. Lark in this matter. His assiduity is well known among his fellow citizens and his laudable efforts meets with our full praise.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor,—Please give notice through your columns that the Southern Baptist Missionary Seminary (Day's Hope,) will be opened for the reception of pupils on the first Monday in next month.

Studies in the common School department.

Spelling, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, Geography, English Grammar &c. Hours of tuition, from 9. A. M. to half past 2. P. M. Requiring a perfect lesson to be gotten at home.

Attention will be given to call into action the thinking powers of the pupils. To influence them to a good and virtuous conduct, tenderness of conscience, attention to religion, and courteousness of manners &c.

Higher Department.

First section will embrace Ancient, and Modern History, Natural and moral Philosophy. Rhetorical reading &c.

Second section will embrace Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, Latin, and Greek, if desired. Political Economy, Chemistry, Botany, Geology, Astronomy &c.

The Theological Department will embrace

The study of the Holy Scriptures—Scripture History, Church History. Scripture Geography, Church Polity, Evidences of Christianity. The Greek language—The Hebrew if a teacher can be had. Systematic Divinity, Rhetoric—Pulpit Oratory &c.

All will be under the immediate superintendence of the Senior Missionary, who will spare no pains to render this institution efficient. Rules of urbanity and decorum will be duly enforced, and nothing on his part shall be wanting to make the gentlemen, and with God's help the preacher.

JOHN DAY.

The above notice of the opening of the Southern Baptist Mission Seminary, we publish with great pleasure; and we feel that the annunciation of the opening of another Seminary will be hailed by every lover of learning in this community. We cannot have too many institutions for education among us. Our children are increasing, and these doors of moral and religious instruction which are opened for the reception of our youth, will assuredly do much (if properly conducted,) towards preparing them for the various avocations in life. This Seminary for the present, will be under the immediate care and superintendence of the Rev. John Day senior Missionary of the Southern Baptist Board in Liberia. We feel warranted to say, that a much better man for strict moral and christian character cannot be found. We have been acquainted with the Rev., gentleman for several years, and the even unassuming manner of his life, has gained for him a general feeling of respectability and esteem.

We regret exceedingly the limited dimensions of the building, though executed in workman-like manner, we think it quite insufficient for the purpose designed. The present building (if means could be obtained to build a Seminary of larger dimensions,) would suit much better for a dwelling house for the superintendent. Mr. Day's present pastorate in Monrovia for attention, excells any other denomination, and without disparagement to other congregations, that of the Providence Baptist Church is the best attended of any in this City, and we judge there must be more religion amongst them [illegible]

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor,—As there have been much a do here of late in this City about ill-natured mischievous mis-representations which in themselves are deleterious to the influence and character of the individuals who have been so unfortunate as to be the subjects of vulgar spectation. I concluded to consult you upon the propriety of your doing something through your columns to put a stop to such billingsgate slang and meddling with the reputation of persons which speaks very ill indeed of the individuals who are the authors of such disrespectful and slanderous reports of others.

There is a proverbial saying that the tree that bears the sweetest fruit, always suffers the most violence, and thus it is with the characters of individuals. Those who generally are of the best character, are always traduced and slandered, and their slanderers as a general thing, were they known to the world as they are to themselves, would not be fit subjects for the lowest society in the City. And Mr. Editor, if this is the type of our best society, what shall I say to you, or your numerous readers of the worst. I am rather inclined Mr. Editor to entertain more liberal sentiments of the matter, and hope for the better. But, by the way sir, I will define this part of the subject more particularly, for to speak too general, would implicate both classes, (male and female) and place the innocent in the same shade with the guilty. This slander and tale bearing proceeds I am informed from among the females, which places these busy-body, talkative women in a very poor light in the community. It shows that they must be very lazy and idle to find so much time to prate from house to house.

Yours until you hear from me again,
JUNIUS.

Monrovia, September 1st, 1856.

Our correspondent Junius, calls our attention to a subject which has been a source of much grief and mortification to us. We would that these things were not so, and more especially, when we are cognizant of so many influences that have been put from time to time in operation for correcting the manners of our females. But we will not, neither dare we entertain for a moment the idea that our fair maidens are implicated in this matter. There may be a few of the old matrons who have never left off altogether their crude manners, who will misjudge and misrepresent matters. Their examples though, are contagious, and their baneful influence is calculated to spread. For the benefit of the rising generation, they should try to govern there talkative passions.

I have deemed it advisable to adopt this medium through which to let all concerned know, that the Editorial article refering to Bishop Payne and his misunderstanding with the Rev. E. W. Stokes, which appeared in the Liberia Herald for the 20th of August, have no connection with any action of the government whatever, and probably would have appeared more appropriately as a communication over my individual signature. Notwithstanding, there are many of our citizens who endorse the sentiments contained therein! Yet, as the Herald is under government patronage, and as it is far from the policy of this government to encourage—engage in—or interfere with contentions and misunderstandings among the different denominations of christians or among branches of the same sect, where the laws of this Republic are not violated. I beg to disabuse the minds of all concerned of any ill impression relative to the government, and stand individually responsible for the article refered to.

POET'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Liberia Herald.

Jesus our Redeemer.

Immortal souls set free,
By Heaven's precious heir;
Jesus invites us'd the tree,
Of wisdom's richest fair:
He broke the bands of sin,
That bound us to the earth;
He set us free, a home to win,
By His own humble birth.

He heard the sinner's cry,
And chose to be his friend;
That wretched starving soul like I,
Might freely, freely rend.
Oh Jesus, source of bliss—
'Tis heaven where thou art;
Oh speak! and give our souls a lift,
And bid us ne'er depart.

We bow before thy throne,
And pray for hearts of love;
Illume us with that light, that's borne,
Thro' thy bright plains above.
Then will our soul's rejoice,
And agonize for faith;
We'll preach thy blessed word from choice,
And keep within thy path.

R. H. Gibson.

An Epistle to a student, on hearing of his intention to marry.

Dear Sir:—the wisest man once said,
That "love is strong as death,"—you know;
Although you may have, or not, read—
That love oft strikes a fatal blow!

Nor is the sage from love exempt,
For love knows him not from the fool;
But causes either, much torment,
While training him up to his school.

One cannot wonder at the sage,
That seeks to form connubial bond,
While Sol'mon, wisest in his age,
Was, of connubial bonds, so fond.

Tho' I'll ask not thee of thy love,
I'll truly sanction in all good;
The wisest best men, lovers prove,
And why not, well as take their food?

They have strange notions too, at times,
Peculiar to their precious mind;
Were I to give the whole in rhyme,
I'd leave not all thy acts behind.

Friend Rumor tells me as she flies,
("As two are better" far "than one")
That you're about to seek supplies,
Of loves,—that may produce a son.

I'd welcome thee in thy pursuit,
If I but knew thy heart's desire;
Perhaps before you much recruit;
In love,—I'll know, and too, admire.

Concluded from the first page.

Out-landish provisions has ever had the highest preference, and to this day, some say, "I want to purchase cassava &c., for my hogs, native boys, and cows!" Thus Africa's yielding have been neglected and rejected, and that of other countries prefered, and procured, for sustenance. Thus progressively and unwittingly we have shot wide of the mark, and have taught our children to follow in our train in this unhappy respect. It is useless to keep pleading, that foreign food is best for us foreigners, we are use to it, cannot now learn to live upon African productions, let our grand children learn that, emigration must be finished, and cease, and the last drop of the blood of Ham come over, before this, eating old American bread and meat can be given up.

So is it wrong to argue that American provisions are absolutely necessary, or even more necessary to life in Africa than the productions of our own soil. These opinions are entertained simply because we have innured ourselves to have it so, and that too, * * * *; to our hurt. Liberians are the most formidable devourers, and gormandizers of foreign provisions, I will venture to say in the whole world! * * * * * * * We may safely say, we eat up in foreign provisions over half of all the profits made, and some of the principal too, on all the palm oil, rice, camwood, ivory, and missionary expenditures &c. * * * * * * * * * * * Well might David Moore, call us "the eatingest people he ever * *." Salt provisions, bread-stuffs, and do I miss the mark when I say one hundred thousand dollars, go into the hands of foreigners for provisions alone, annually—devoured by wholesale and retail by us. Is foreign pork, bacon, butter, beef, fish of all sorts, size and kinds, flour, meal, and ready made bread of all qualities, down to the ginger cake, and even sweet meats, and confectionaries; better for Africa? sugar, coffee, and rice too, in the bargain, than that which God made indigenuous and livible and growable, on our own soil? What is our own maise, rice, millet, taniers, yams, potatoes, cassava, plantains, bananas, fruits, oils, hogs, sheep, goats, beef, turkeys, ducks, fowls, &c., &c? Has not Africa her own abundant stock? Can it not, if not pushed out by foreign preferences, be made in tenfold abundance into bread, salted meat, preserves, ginger cake and pound cake too? If need be. God has given Africa, Liberia a seed. Soil rich and excellent, and competent to produce that seed. Our own Africa, has its own necessities of life, and luxuries too, and the nation lives not, that sets itself up against itself, as does Liberia. This nation expects to live upon luxuries under the name of necessities of life. They ought to be called luxuries, as they are in truth, as being extra to what should be the necessities of the country. The strongest plea put in to make the foreign productions, necessities, is that which arises from the necessity of their use, from the neglect in nine tenths of Liberians from usage, to produce our own; while foreigners keep theirs filling the market. "These things must be winked at now." Why? If they are, they should be only from this day fourth,—as monsterous inconsistences into which we have been thoughtless led, and to which, we have adhered to the neglect of our own rice fields, corn crops, yam, and tania heads, coffee, plantain, coco, and fruit orchards, and gardens to the overthrow of their hog-pens, goat, and sheep, fowls, hen-houses duck-yards, and turkey-pens, and to the depriving our own homes and yards, of lowing kind, bleating flocks, squealing pigs, quacking ducks, peeing turkeys, and cackling hens, that ought to be ever before us in teaming and flattering fleshly life.

Domestic economy is on the wrong foundation entirely. Our labour and energy directed for our support to the wrong points. Starting from false premises, we rush along the wrong road of life, enjoy a wrong and destructive happiness. The adult population of Liberia are a hard working people, a laborious set of men and women, but their occupations most of them, from these usages causes them to exert a useless energy,—that end one half in the cavities that receive their independence through their own throats; foreigners pocketing, the price of their sweat.

2. False notions, of what constitutes a man a gentleman, a woman a lady—and what is a respectable appearance in the world, and in what true equality consists, and such like things has much to do with this condition. Now, if virtue, is moral goodness, the practice of moral duties, and obtaining from vice, or a conformity of life and conversation to moral law, a particular moral excellence.—If to be honest, is to be upright, just, fair, frank, and sincere, according to truth, proceeding from pure and just principles, and if honesty in principle springs from moral rectitude of the heart, then to be a gentleman in this view, is to be what these things imply. In Republics, where titles reign not, the term is is applied to men of education, to good breeding in all occupations; and wh[illegible] found without reference to riches—to [illegible]s, civil manners;—the term gentle women [illegible] takes in the same qualities, a woman above vulgarity and black-guardism, a woman of good breeding—what we call good manners, genteel, well breed soft, tender, delicate; based upon the moral training of the Bible. The true gentleman and lady is found wherever moral honesty exists in virtue, without respect to dollars and cents, in gold, silver, goods, or any such thing. Respectability then, must not be looked for in the number of dresses, of various kinds, and struts, or flounces, or beau, or caquets, or gold watches, chains, and rings. All these may exist in a man, or a woman, and the gentleman and lady, be absent,—and very little of them may be found, with plenty of poverty, and want, and a thatched house, and the gentleman and lady be present. Let the thing respectable come home to its legitimate place in society, and reign; as that estimation in which men should hold true worth and substantial good qualities, giving them their due bias, then the state or quality of being respectable, will receive wherever found from the hovel to the palace deserved commendation, as passing the true worth which deserves esteem and honor, and the true classes No 1. No 2. &c., will be rated as God will rate them in heaven, and as the good ought to rate them on earth.

Some northern gentlemen was once on a visit to——several ladies were in the party, all seemed well behaved, according to the rules of propriety,—and some of them very intelligent, except one; it was an agreeable party, this one lady, was illiterate, course vulgar, and to use a common expression, ill mannered; still she was carressed, invited, waited upon, and every attention showed her to the neglect of the rest by certain gentlemen. On parting one of the gentlemen makes inquiry, as to who the ladies were, when to his surprise, he found the well behaved, intelligent, women, were no ladies, but only common livers, half strainers, but the vulgar strollop, was a lady—of the first blood of the country! a rich young widow man, said one of them!—she has four hundred and fifty negroes, and make six hundred bails of cotton! Now right at this point, does not Liberia too much calculate? After all is not money, too much of a foundation for virtue and morals? I do not pretend to hint, that many of our moneyed folks are not the most honest, upright, noble, industrious people in the country. And that many of our poor are not the most lazy—black-guard, immoral, vulgar in the land. But I do mean to say, that there are good qualities; and good and respectable people in both classes; and at all points from the highest to the lowest, and that rich villiany, should be treated as raged rascality! But there is an undue weight given to money—whether we have it or not. Too often no matter how it is obtained, it makes the respectable man or woman. I will not say money makes the infidel a christian, and that the rich libertine, finds no inconvenience in passing moral society as virtuous, that the drunkard, well dollared, find a very easy and equal birth among sober people, the ass, is curiously intelligent, and that money gives a kind of passport too, and stamps respectability upon money who without it, swims in very muddy water. But I do say I fear something like, the estimation of the negro and cotton growing woman above, resembles too strongly the existence of things in Liberia sometimes.

And does not this give to DRESS a kind of mania, that takes into it respectability on the wrong ground? Is not fashion and extravagance in DRESS here fed and fostered? Yes DRESS, accursed DRESS, murderous DRESS, ungodly DRESS, demoralising Dressing, walks of here with what does not legitimately belong to it. Is not here the great crying sin of Liberia basking under the cloak of respectability? Eating out the other half of the wealth of the country from all sources. The merchant may have a reason for dressing his family, it makes his goods sell. But what are the hidden workings of this all absorbing dress business? Let Liberia inquire a little into this matter, while it is today. 1st. Among the scores of marriageable, and ever [illegible]rting young people in our community, ho[illegible]s it that so few in certain classes marry? Wh[illegible] the register of legitimate, and illegitimate c[illegible], so nearly ballanced? Nor are these reco[illegible]s to be confined to the poor, and No. 3 and [illegible]o. 4 classes either. Is it not that men afflicted with the respectability of the Dress mania find that it takes all they can rake and scrape to procure broad cloth, Casinet, Casimere, Janes of wool, and the finer sorts of cloth c[illegible]s, hats, with gold chains, rings and jewelry? Because they must be respectable and beloved young gentleman. Why are so many lads seen smoking, shooting, idling about, dressed up like stuffed frogs! while their poor mothers and fathers, are * * * worked to death;—why? from false notions of the disrespectability of work as connected with dress. Work good enough for natives, &c. Not able to provide for themselves what will they do with a family? A lady butterfly, who must have a new dress every week, and sometimes more. And all the foreign pork, bacon, beef, flour &., &c., &., she can gormandize besides; and no mean house and something in it too besides. And my father and my husband must find it, must do it. Is not an impassible gulf [illegible] known in between the young maid, for marriage and conjugal friendship? nature says it is not good to be alone.

And what young man can venture to the great houses, to find a wife, without hoping help from the "big houses," to mind her, that is feed and clothe her? Their extravagance have had its life long sway, and how often when one does this, is he so plainly suspected, that he heartlessly backs out leaving his tender love in tears. Still high clothed, and highly fed, and full of blood, and passion and fire, made for society, with * * * * * * * * * * warmer grasps of legal sociability, thwarted? How often is the hopeless plunge taken down the gulf of sensuality deep! deep!! deep!!! And why is it so strange strained, destorted, and foolish notions of respectability, and out side show of it is indulged. A man of money may wear Dungaree, and his riches passes him, but no other dungaree wearer, must approach the shrine respectable. The standard of our social and moral measure, is founded too much in "filthy lucre," based too much on "the root of all evil," and its influences are evil, and only evil viewed from any point whatever. Truth is, dress must be had, honestly if it can be gotten, [illegible] must be had! and here the cost of dress be[illegible]es often dearer than life itself! * * * * * * * * *? But I let the curtain fall—and ask must we ever live so? Can we exist? We must all go back, into and trace our blood—from the brutalized trammels, and influences of slavery. A pretty dead evil then I confess, trade ourselves out, by personal honesty, virtue, and proper respectability, maintained, or recovered, and estimate how is it now? How with me? set the true standard. Aim at the true mark ourselves, and aid those impartially who do so too. Then we will hear less of this I am as good as him, or her, and see less unnatural straining to show it. Then this man will not be sued at law so much for meat, and dress, Mr. and Mrs. will not be so much at war about it. Untold thousands now hung as fool marks on the back, will go into our purses and chests, to help us in honorable and honest pursuits of life, and to find living and lasting monuments, of personal and of national improvement; our holy marriage rights will not be wa red and cut off—our families and very existence will no longer be as curses to us. We will no longer weep over the lost chastity of our daughters, and the worthlessness of our sons—labour made honorable will give its reward.

Elijah Johnson.

Greenville Sinoe, Sept. 1st, 1856.

My Dear Sir,—I embrace this opportunity of writing about matters in general. The conduct of the Butaw people, concerning the indemnification, gave rise to suspicions of there being some evil design existing among those tribes; and reports brought in from the interior strengthened certainly, these suspicions. Joe Weah sent a message to me to this effect, that the [illegible] the ranks of the Bataw, while they were at war with him; that when peace was proposed, "Nyah" was not mentioned, nor did Butaw notify them to discontinue hostilities, this according to their notions of things would justify them in fighting "Joe Weah," and that the Nyah people were preparing to attack him. Much anxiety on the subject were manifest by our people, especially after it was heard, that "Tom Puss," was the instigator of it.

I determined immediately to send to Bataw, and have the matter investigated. The Commissioner E. J. Kirk, and his interpreter were absent three days, on his return, he reported favorably of the appearance of things. "Tom Puss" and all the Headmen denied the report altogether, that no such design was ever thought of for a moment. Tom says, they have had enough of war, and there is not a man in the country at all disposed to take up his musket. Mr. Kirk says, from personal observation, there is nothing indicative of hostilities, they are suffering greatly from the effects of the weather, and other inconveniences.

They are now actively employed preparing to settle the indemnity. The amount has been divided among the men according to circumstances.

"Tom Puss," being the richest man, assumed one hundred croos, some have taken forty, fifty &c., and the greatest solicitude is apparent, to be rid of the fine in a few days, I hope to receive something from them, they have men in the bush country, engaging bullocks, sheep, goats, &c., to help the cause forward.

On the 24th. ult., the little captive girl, was restored to us by Jumbo and John, she looks well, Jim Dow, has sent for his neice, the Blue Barre people demands her; and I will have the matter adjusted to-day.

We are all doing pretty well, all things considered, and if the light fingered gentry could only be controlled, we would be at ease with regard to such edibles as are generally produced here, I am of the opinion that special enactments will have to be made for this county, by the Legislature. * * * * * *

We are more than obliged to you for the seeds, the season was dry, and some will certainly be lost, however, that does not alter the case, we are quite grateful to you, and Dr. Forney, to whom tender our grateful thanks.

With kind wishes for the health of you and family.

I am yours truly,
R. E. Murray.

THE MORMONS.

It is a remarkable fact that the greater part of the recruits to the Mormon settlement come from Europe. Ship load after ship load of deluded immigrants arrive at New York and Boston. Women take their children and desert their husbands, leaving them often in debt, and stripping them of all that they can carry away. The accounts which the English papers give of this infatuation are marvellous. Thus it is that the United States bear the odium of the vileness and obscenity, of what, after all, is rather a European than an American community.—Providence Journal.

THE MIRACULOUS REMEDY!!!

TEN YEARS INTERMITTENT ATTACKS OF ERYSIPELAS! EFFECTUALLY CURED.

Copy of a Letter from Mrs. H. Trimmer, of Compton, near Winchester, dated 13th Sep. 1853.

To Professor Holloway.

SIR.—I suffered for a period of ten years, (until the last six months,) with the most dreadful intermittent attacks of Erysipelas, which confined me to my bed during the whole of the summer months in each year, I consulted the most eminent medical gentlemen in Winchester, but was from time to time doomed to be disappointed in my hopes of obtaining any relief to my sufferings, although I complied strictly with the directions my advisers gave me. At length I was persuaded to give your Ointment and Pills a trial, by a female friend who had been cured of a bad leg by using them; to my surprise and delight, a change for the better was quickly produced, and in a very short time, they caused the Erysipelas totally to disappear, and my health was entirely reinstated which has remained good ever since. I remain, gratefully yours.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF SCROFULA.

WILLIAM PROCUE, of Emyvale, (a young man well known in that neighbourhood,) was afflicted for three years with Scrofula on the left arm there were four ulcers which discharged continuously, and reduced the poor fellow to a mere skeleton. He was for a long time under the care of one medical gentleman, and consulted many others, but derived no benefit whatever. At last he had recourse to Holloway's Ointment and Pills, and by persevering with these remedies in the course of eight weeks, his arm was completely well, and his health thoroughly re-established.

The truth of this statement can be verified by many of the inhabitants of Emyvale, and particularly by Mr. PATRICK MC KENNY, Druggist, of that place.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases;—

LIBERIA HERALD.

Mr. Editor,—In yours of the 3rd, inst., "Africa," discharges his piece once more, and then retreats in the smoke. Well, we think he is wise; for he has evidently an uncongenial subject in hand, and the worst side of it at that. In the two articles from him in rebuttal to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, "Africa" does himself great injustice. And we must beg all who read these two productions, not to regard them as a fair specimen of his style of writing. We flatter ourself that we now know who Africa is. If our opinion of his whereabouts be correct, we take pleasure in saying, that not long since, we saw an article from his pen, that no Liberian could read, with feeling a just pride in reflecting upon the various evidences of ability which the article displayed. But here he is out of his element.

That he does not design to be pugnacious is very clear we think, and the manifestation of this spirit, strongly inclines us to say no more. But Africa complains that we have treated him ill, and asks us to point out to him, "for which of the things," in his former communication, he is to be "condemned." We feel the kindest disposition towards him, but in our judgment, Africa ought to blame himself for committing two errors, at least, in the move he has made.

1st. We believe we state only what is generally known, when we say, it is a principle among the denominations of protestant christendom, to allow each branch of the church of Christ, to manage, to their own liking, their denominational arrangements—their own domestic concerns;—except in cases where their action proves to be a clear infraction of rights not exclusively their own, or where some great moral wrong has been committed, or has been allowed, demanding, on the part of those without the pale of their church, unpleasant public animadversion. Where either of the last named conditions exist, the denominational action, is no longer a private or domestic concern, but a public one, and as such, may be characterized and spoken of by any one, who may chose to take an interest in the discussion arising out of it; and in such terms, as the nature of the case may dictate, as proper and right. Africa, will no doubt permit us to set forth how this principle has been respected, and has operated in Liberia. Two or three years since, a minister in the Presbyterian Church, it was reported, had indulged in a flagrant wrong. Around this case, as the circumstances connected with it, were gradually developed, much interest gathered, not only within the denomination immediately concerned, but out of it also. As in all similar instances everywhere, different views obtained, but we believe no one took either side to task in the public prints—thus admitting both the correctness and value of the principle above stated, that where no right, not belonging to herself, has been infracted, every church is to be left to manage her own domestic matters, as she pleases. Again: at this moment, there is a controversy in the public Journals, between different individuals, members of the Protestant Episcopal Church. This controversy awakens no little feeling in different, and we may say, opposite quarters, and some discussion in private circles. But no one without the pale of that church, has felt called upon, to erect himself into an umpire, and summons the parties to a definitive settlement of their litigated question. Here is another proof of the tacit approval of the principle before named, and of its wholesome effect among the sister churches of protestant christendom. The number of examples might be greatly increased, but we trust they are not necessary after what has been advanced.

Mr. Editor, may we inform Africa, that the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, claims the benefit of this principle—this common understanding—that her missionaries, however otherwise obtained they may be, will claim the operation of it for her, and for themselves also, in Liberia. Especially will they claim this for her, and for themselves, while neither herself nor us, has infringed any principle by which the public is [redacted] affected.

Now, Africa can see, without the help of glasses, at least one point where you have erred. You are a member and minister belonging, not to the M. E. Church, but to another christian denomination. And while that church, has called upon you, nor upon any one, the slightest wrong, you have arraigned her highest councils, and sat in judgment upon them;—and that to in a strain of remark, which we do not, will free you from the censure of being over-courteous in your expressions.

2nd. But Africa has hastened, and gave judgment, before all the witnesses were brought into court. A scriptural injunction of great value, to both Africa and us all says, "Judge nothing before the time." The speeches, and the provisions to which they relate, are both of recent date: so much so, that the General Conference had not time to report her doings to the church they represented, and receive her verdict of approval or disapproval, when the wings of the wind wafted to our far-off shores, the first intimation of what had been done with reference to ourselves and mission. We had heard the first part of the story, but as our information in this country comes by piece-meal, the sequel, embracing the strictures upon, and the explanations of the measure, in its history and progress, in its design and effect, had not yet come to hand. While we, as a part of the M. E. Church, stood still, in a listening attitude, expectant of farther information, Africa had reached his conclusions, and passed sentence of condemnation upon the whole affair, all who took part in it, and all who submit to it. Well, the storm is now over, and in our turn we would say to Africa, he has been rather in a hurry, we think. He has spoken not only before he was called upon to do so, but obviously without necessity in the conditions of the case. Here then he will see, without much trouble, we think his second error.

Now, Mr Editor, if you would grant me, instead of two columns, a page in your paper, I might invite Africa's attention in directions within the range of his observation, which importunately ask the influence of his position, and the power of his patriotic pen. We are far from saying to him, "Do not write," but we would refer him to subjects more immediately within his reach. This would save him the trouble of scaling the Atlantic, to spend his arrows upon the M. E. Church. We would find objects nearer home. In that event Mr. Editor, in order to see and hear from the whole population, we would invite him to an airing down the Coast. Stopping at Sinoe, we would inquire, not of picked ones, but of any reliable, common-sensed man we might meet: How do things go here? Are the people generally happy? Are they, as a general thing, comfortable in their circumstances? Is the condition of things prosperous, to quite an important extent? Returning homeward, we would call at Bassa, and ask, what news? repeating the others questions as indicated above. Nor should Marshall be neglected: and though, as we are informed, her citizens have nothing to do with the juries of her own country, except to sit or stand before them: we would not omit to call there, and inquire to what extent the rights of the natives are respected, and secured to them? How are the laws administered? And in what estimation are they held in the social transactions of the place. Halting at the house of a certain magistrate, near the head of the Messurado, we would ask, Anything interesting lately? and without waiting long for his answer, would glide down the river to Monrovia. Here at the seat of government, we should not fail to inquire, what is the literary character of your legislators? Is property safe with you? what provisions have you for the poor, the infirm and aged, the diseased, and the insane? Does pauperism increase? So we would proceed through the settlements along the St. Paul's river. All along we would inquire, what proportion do the productions of country bear to its consumption: that of one half? By the time we had got round, Africa, I doubt not, would find themes of thought sufficiently numerous and important to enlist his powers, and of great practical moment to many citizens of Liberia—subjects to which if he would lend the influence of his position, and his pen, would not only embalm his memory in the grateful affections of his generation, but would encircle his name with a wreath of fadeless glory for ages to come.

I am very far from endorsing the opinion that nothing is being done to correct and lessen the number of the evils, which the line of remark pursued above, would indicate. On the contrary, it is not difficult to see that that kind prescription, which in newly settled places is prone to be the standard by which the transactions of community are regulated, rather than law, and which has had its influence in Liberia, is now fast departing before the safer, and clearer decisions of the law, impartially administered. There are those no doubt, whose constant effort it is, to give these impartial operations of the law, their widest effect—their broadest circumference. And so in relation to other things, improvement is discernible. To keep before the minds of those most deeply interested for our country's good, the bow of promise, and a door of hope. But there is no such perceivable rapidity of advancement in any department within our knowledge, as will justify that fustain of remark, sometimes employed, to set forth the wealth, abilities, and progress of Liberia. After twenty-two years of anxious observation, we find no reason to doubt, that as a Republic, we are here by the appointment of an overruling Providence. And we have as little question, that it is within the competency of the people of Liberia, with the foreign aid supplied to them, to work out the high behests of that Providence. But in order to accelerate the desired period of success, lying beyond the fear of failure, every man must to gird himself for the occasion, in view of the imminence of the stakes at issue, and address him to his duty, in a laborious and self-relying spirit.

When it is considered that the M. E. Church has expended upon Liberia, between one half and three fourths of a million of dollars; when by the officiaries of the government, as well as through less important channels of communication, these overwrought discriptions of Liberia's prosperity, in almost every line of industry, is set forth; and when at last, "Africa" comes forth, to more than intimate the ability of the Liberia Mission of the M. E. Church, to support herself, and call upon her, before the world to make the trial, on pain of being denounced "hugging an evil, for the sake of its concomitant ease, and external comfort," I repeat, when all this is done, shall we take fire, if the Rev'ds. Bishop Scott, James H. Perry, H. Bangs, while discussing a great public measure, relating to their African Mission, look round, with these reports of our progress before them, and ask, what have these prosperous people done for Africa? At least, would it be a mark of wisdom in us, would it exalt our reputation, or in any conceivable way do good, for us to be so very independent, as to devour our own vitals in an endeavor to sustain its premature declaration? No Africa, you will have to do better than this. This will never do. It requires too much patching and fixing. Surely, you must try again.

Africa complains that we have not answered him; that we have "dodged" the point, "evaded" it, &c. He ought to recollect that we made no pretensions to replying to his article. He will see, if he will read over our former notice of him, that we purposely avoided an answer, on the ground that his article was aspersory of us, and that these aspersions came from behind a fictitious name.

(2.) He says that the subject of an independent church is "repugnant" to some of the ministers of the M. E. Church in Liberia. He is mistaken. It is a very fragrant subject. But these simple minded ministers do not intend to cut their own throats, and the throats of all the institutions they supervise, by proclaiming that independence this year, nor till such period, as in their opinion, they can sustain themselves, and the interests they have in charge, with some degree of vigor and effectiveness.

(3.) We have called him a "paltroon" No; Africa's act, in sending forth an article like his of the 6*th*, August, over a fictitious name, was an act of "paltroonery"—of moral cowardice. Did we wrong him, in so saying. Then are we very sorry. But before we acknowledge, let us hear if he, in his last communication does not endorse, in so many words, all we have said on that point. Speaking of not giving his name, he says, "I have a name" but, Liberia has grown to so high a state of refinement, or sunken to so low a depth of ignorance" (Which of these two opposites contains the virus, he does not know) that if one expresses a thought, in any wise contrary to the common way of thinking here, he is denounced and called num-skull." Now Mr. Africa, what lays at the bottom of your not giving your proper name, as we insisted you should have done, in an article of the character of yours. Why, your dread of being "denounced, and called a num-skull," according to your own confession. Let the world judge between us, and we feel confident of a clear acquital. We are truly sorry this is so. It ought not to be so, that a man of Africa's talent and position, in the discharge of what he conscientiously believes to be duty, is afraid of words. He will not make a good reformer on this principle. Let us tell him, he is wanting in one of the elements, entering into the composition of a large and liberal mind. I hope he will not allow this to stand so.

(4.) He will "put off his sheep's clothing," when we "convince him, that he is not an African." This we shall not undertake to do; for, to his honor be it spoken, any one who sees him, would reproach us for our folly, should we be so forgetful of tangible qualities, as to make the trial.

(5.) He intimates that that kind of ecclesiasticism which leaves its ministers to preach, and gather support from some secular occupation, is to be prefered to that which contemplates a full supply for their reasonable wants, but restricts their attention to matters clearly within the sphere of their operation, as ministers and pastors of the church of God. This we simply deny, and leave Africa at his leisure to supply the proof in support of the truth of his assertion.

Mr. Editor, Africa has grieved us as an individual, by the clear confession of his timidity to appear before his fellow-citizens, on any subject belonging to him, as a high public functionary, for fear of opposition. We really hope he is peculiar in this respect. The time has now come, when gentlemen having right on their side, and the public good at their heart, should not be fearful, of adding to whatever they may have to say, the authority and weight of their proper name. The exigencies of the times, and the character of our people, demand this at the hands of leading men.

Yours &c.

LIBERIA HERALD

MONROVIA, WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 17, 1856.

The Constitution.

This safe-guard to the liberties of every people of a Constitutional organization of government, is looked to as the foundation of their political rights and privileges, and esteemed the proudest monument of their national honor. The formation of the Magna Charter of England which the steel clad soldiers of Britain compelled king John to sign, was the establishment of English liberty, and the consolidation of all the elements of social and civil order for the perpetuation and perpetuity of the dignity of a government held in the legal Sovereign of the land. From the era of the Monarchy established by Egbert out of the ruins of the Saxon heptarchy, to the era 1205 of the establishment of the Magna Charter, the English people had found no real centre of united political action apart from the constant and never sleeping machinations of ambitious princes seeking rule. Surrounded as the English Constitution now is, by men of eminent talent and ability, her laws have become famous for legal justice, and are renowned and practised to a great extent, among most of the Christian nations. Her polity encourages every branch of business, notwithstanding the working of a machinery of government so universal in extent, in its multiplied municipal associations which are constantly revolving on their corporate axis of organization, dependent upon the Sovereign law as a protectorate, yet withal, justice is afforded to every class of society in the equal administration of law, based upon the acknowledged right of every subject in the person of the Sovereign as the mother or father of the whole as the case may be.

The American Republic, held by its federal confederacy, i., e., the constitutional organization of the several independent States into a Federal Union for national progress, secures to every State the full enjoyment of civil order by its local administration in its own sovereignty, subject to the provisions of the federal Constitution for the just and equal enhancement of the Union—thereby securing a national luxuriance that gives beauty and apparent verdure to every branch of government.

The Constitution of the Republic of Liberia contains at present, all those embodyments of civil order and encouragements to national prosperity and progress, consistent with her development, however rapidly she may travel for years to come. Yet, with all her virtue and her beauty—however verdant her prosperity may appear; if her character is not properly understood—if her ministerial agencies are not of the same class—if they are not applied to the same end—her office becomes of none effect, and the consequence will be, a sickening loathsome drag of a political existence that will in every tendency of its operation, add dishonor to the government. The beauty of political constitutional development, is seen in the administration of the laws constitutionally, giving to every citizen what is his constitutional due without denial or delay, which measure attaches every citizen to his country and to the laws, from the fact, that he sees where his dearest interest lies, and in what his liberties consists. What he has to defend, and what he is not to offend. For instance, should a citizen commit an open and atrocious burglary, the peaceful populace would be incensed should he not be punished for his crime, because he had offended the law that they jointly covenanted to defend; but should his punishment exceed that as is provided by the law, they would become equally as indignant, because it would be an aggression of the common liberty. For example, we will quote a clause in the Constitution which will probably suit our present consideration the best. "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, property or privilege, but by judgment of his peers." which we define thus—that no person shall suffer death but by judgment of twelve honest citizens in whom he had a choice—no person shall be condemned to imprisonment or hard labor in chains upon public works or suffer any corporeal punishment, but by judgment of twelve honest citizens in whom he had a choice, (with the exception of fine and imprisonment for contempt of court during session) why? Because to restrain the liberties of the most inconsiderable citizen of the State, unless as provided for by the Constitution, is the greatest breach of the law; from the fact, that the liberties of every citizen is alike invaded, and as every one is alike interested in the common weal.

Again, suppose for instance that the statute, in cases of petit larceny, should adjudge that the prisoner should restore four fold the value of the property stolen, and in default thereof, to be hired out to the highest bidder for a time sufficient to liquidate damages and cost of suit by any one or two Magistrates associated, before whom the the cause was tried. We ask, suppose this to be the case, would it be constitutional for a Magistrate or two, in default of the prisoners restoring four fold value of the property stolen, to command the hire of such prisoner to the highest bidder for a time sufficient to satisfy damages and cost of suit? We answer with a single negative no. Because, the Constitution adjudges that the liberty of no person shall be taken but by judgment of his peers, and such a stride over constitutional rights and consonant legal principles as should be, places the magistrate in an umpire position above that of any other judiciary tribunal which the Constitution never anticipated—making him both judge and jury. Then, such a law would reasonably be considered no law at all, for the Constitution abrogated it no sooner than it presented an opposite feature to justice, and the legal axiom here properly applies itself, that whatever is repugnant to the Constitution is unlawful, and should at no hazzards be enforced. The legislature we know creates the law; but to judge and determine the spirit and intent of the law, belongs properly to the courts,—though many assay times, to place the legislature in the position of an extra-judicial body. To further the ends of justice, the Constitution authorizes too important functionaries learned in the law, to determine and judge wisely the constitutionality of the same, before it is placed in the possession of the inferior courts. Why this care one might be led to ask? Simply, because it is by the wholesome administration of just and equal constitutional laws that the liberties of the people are guaranteed, and as we before remarked, secures to the most inconsiderable citizen, his just and equal portion of constitutional liberty, in connection with the most wealthy citizen, as society can never be rid (and which would be the destruction of it were it the case,) of such persons who always distinguish themselves by advantages which gives them a very considerable influence.

The Attorney General and the Chief Justice, are two eminently important judiciary functionaries, who should be minutely skilled in the knowledge of the laws, and the Attorney General particularly, from the fact, that he is designed to be the Constitutional sentinel, to give the alarm when there are any illegal approaches to the constitutional premises. Now every law that may be passed, should be carefully examined by him, being of a clear head and sound mind, to ascertain its constitutionality in every part, and the moment he discovers an unconstitutional trace in any part of the law, he should immediately solicit the opinion of the Chief Justice, and should his opinion be in affirmation of the unconstitutionality of the law, it should without delay, be made known to the President, who being the Chief of every department of government, will give order for the non-execution of the same, until such time as he shall have advised with the Legislature.

The object of the Constitution is, to place the liberties of every citizen beyond the limits of malevolent cupidity, and thus, however atrocious the crime may be of which a citizen is accused, his trial can never be effected without the concurrence of a majority of the grand inquest for the county in which he resides or where the offence was committed upon a bill of indictment found against him, and who must be confronted with the evidence against him in open court—who must have the right of Constitutional defence in his own person and also by counsel—who must be allowed the challenging liberty of the jury to prevent the power of any influence against him—who must be tried by twelve jurors a part of whom he had the undenied right in choosing, and from whom he must expect and also receive a verdict of guilty or not guilty. Why? Because these means of justice are placed as safe-guards against tyranny; and as there is no citizen so far removed from the diabolical influences of envy and malice, that, were it not for these drawbacks to the wicked purposes of many, anarchy and blood-shed would trample over the Constitution into the most sacred places of the State. The jurors in their decisions, are independent in all cases,—though the law provides for cases in which the verdict of a jury may be set aside, and a new trial granted. [see Statue page 98, sec., 16 & 18.] Yet, the Court should be very careful and discrete in the exercise of this privilege, being fully convinced of the law being satisfied in the "ground of the motion" or evidence as the case may be, and in no-wise to place himself in hostility to so important agency in the prosecution of justice, without there appearing bevond doubt, a real departure from law, evidence or the legal instructions of the Court; and in which case, the majesty of the law should be maintained with that becoming steraness that would place the Court in its proper position, having before it this olden-time maxim, fiat justitia, ruat coelum. But in this, we would not be understood to infer that it is the Courts prerogative to dictate peremptorily to the jury what manner of verdict to bring in, as to whether for or against a party, for in such a case, the character of a jury would become a hoax in any country. The Judge in his address to a jury, may with propriety sum up the character of the evidence briefly, and read the law in the case to the jury to refresh their minds after hours of wearied attention, and then say, "gentlemen, you have heard the evidence, and the law in the case, you can retire to your room and find a verdict accordingly." The juries prerogative and duty, is to determine causes according to the best of their ability, whether it involves law or fact—to award damages—and even in criminal cases, after finding a verdict of guilt, as jurors in the cause, if they see any ground, it is their indispensable duty to draw up a petition to the Court for its clemency in judgment, without being subject to censure, injury or accusation. This Constitutional privilege, places the law in its proper position as the empire in the distribution of the liberties of the people which we trust may always be the portion of the citizens of Liberia.

The spiritedness of the communications from "Africa" and the Rev. F. Burns, including another which appears in this number of the Herald over the signature "Methodist," we feel can be of no essential benefit to the authors neither to the subject matter in consideration. And as such communications are apt to lead to something very unpleasant in the future should we allow their continuance: we beg to say, that we would be very happy if the disputants would discontinue such communications to the Herald. While the Herald is a government paper—and while citizens may feel that they have a right to speak their sentiments through its coulmns, yet, we consider it not the vehicle for bitter invectives, and vituperation out of which cannot possibly grow any good. We may be accused for the position assumed, but we think we have kept the races, as equal as possible, and for fear of the intrusion of another card for a share, we would be obliged if the gentlemen who have shown so much good sense and language, would employ their time, and privilege in writing to a purpose of special benefit to their country. Methodist apparently, has forgotten the fable of the contest between the knights on the shield, one said it was made of silver, and the other said that it was made of gold, while neither of them would take the pains to see of what particular metal it was composed, or of what portion of either. The third person stept up and adjusted the difficulty by satisfying them examining the grounds of their contention, that they were both right in their calculations as regard the parts, as one side of the shield was made of gold, and the other was made of silver; but Methodist has taken fire altogether in favor of one party, and dealt in as bitter invectives, which will undoubtedly lead to a reply if not stopped. Equality in warfare is where the parties present an equality in the materials for combat, and depend upon their skill in management, but should there be an unevenness in material, and the out-numbering party be routed and repulsed, the disgrace is truly the more mortifying, and the victor gains an hundred laurels over the vanquished where in all probability, had they been equal in combat he would have gained but one or none at all.

COMMUNICATION.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr. Editor,—Allow me, if you please a short space, in your columns for a remark or two on an article, which appeared in your last issue, over the signature, "Africa."

It has, no doubt, occurred, to some of your readers, to ask themselves, is this Africa a Methodist Minister; or even a member of the M. E. Church? I will, therefore, venture to reply, He is not either: and, if not either. Is he not, then, "a busy-body in other men's matters, "obtruding himself, with his offensive advice, upon the patience of the church? And is he not, also, a hypocrite, so ready to accuse others of hyprocrisy, writing, as though he were one of the Methodists, "We ought to get our own bishop as quickly as possible. "And is it not probably his real motive, to disturb, if he can, the peace of the church and injure its interests, while he promotes some ulterior design of his own!

Most persons will have noticed the overweening conceit of this Africa. He "finds some men so much the creatures of circumstances," that he "almost despairs awaking them to a true sense of their interest, charm he never so wisely;"—he finds "no man may expect to change at once the modes, customs, and habits of any people;" he finds "it impossible to make two men see alike at once; and though the principles of the one are superior in every way to those of the other, and though such principles be founded upon reason and experience, while the opinions of the other rest merely on supposition, still he being tenacious of his long practised opinions &c., will resist every argument advanced by his opponent; "and he comforts himself by taking "examples of men who had set themselves up as beacons and way-marks to enlighten and instruct their fellow men and to induct them into things involving their present and future interests." Surely a Solomon has arisen in our midst; and his wisdom, we trust, will not die with him! But to what end would this beacon with his strong light, illumine his fellow men? To the end that they might secure a colored bishop to over-see the M. E. Church, in Liberia! It was hardly worth while, that another, and such a beacon; should lift itself up to this end.

The stupidity and malice of this Africa have, also, been perceived. From behind the screen of a feigned name, he proposes questions to the Rev. Mr. Burns, as though he supposed Mr. Burns would be stultus enough to answer. He asks, whether Mr. Burns endorses a certain opinion said to have been expressed by bishop Scott, at the late General Conference. Is this ignorance or impertinence. Is Mr. Burns, then, to be questioned for bishop Scott's opinions? And, further, he inquires, If what bishop Scott said, with regard to the Mission here entertaining doubts of their being able to manage their own affairs, if left alone, be true"! Had Mr. Burns known he would not be answering to a wolf in sheep's clothing, he could, doubtless, have replied! The Bishop's of the M. E. Church are men of God, and do not lie. What bishop Scott said was true. For if the Mission, in Liberia, have the piety and the intelligence requisite to take care of itself, it has not yet the pecuniary means. But when the time shall have fully come, and the Mission is quite prepared to undertake its own affairs, it will negotiate, in a fraternal and christian spirit, and with hearty thankfulness for long tried and fostering friendship and liberalities, to be set off, by the parent church, as an Independent Society.

And, then, because Dr. Perry said something, indebate, in the General Conference, displeasing to this Africa, he foams out his righteous indignation, "We ought to let this union,"—the union between the M. E. Church in the States and the Methodist Mission in Liberia,—"which is fraught with so much injustice and hypocrisy, and whose primary object it is to lord it over God's heritage, be dissolved at once." Was it, indeed, injustice and hypocrisy in the Church in the States to have nourished and cherished, through so many years, the Mission here, as it never did any other of its foreign Missions! Was it injustice and hypocrisy to have spent, for many years, from 15, to 30,000$ annually, to further the interests of the Mission, in Liberia? Was it lording it over God's heritage, to have intrusted the Mission and its interests, for the last five or six years, wholly in the hands of the Liberia Conference? Was it lording it over God's heritage to have authorized, as the late General Conference did authorize, the Liberia Annual Conference to elect for Episcopal ordination any man they pleased, red, white or colored, provided only he were an elder, in good standing, in the M. E. Church? Would this Africa make out the M. E. Church, in Liberia, to be the basest and most ungrateful of all affiliated Churches?

This Africa, Mr. Editor, is a pseudo Africa. The true personation of Africa would have been a female; but, I am sure, this is a very degenerate male descendant. Had Africa opened her mouth, she would have spoken words of truth and soberness; but the effusion before us is characterized by self conceit, ignorance and bad feeling. Had Africa had ought to say to the M. E. Church or Ministry, she would have come forth with open guise and dignity; but this Africa, skulking, as if ashamed of his own name and of the worthlessness of what he was about to say,—skulking, behind the shadow of a name, seeks, with a few expressions he had found, to embitter the the kindly and Christian feelings subsisting between two sections of Christ's Church, intimately related; and to goad on, if possible, the one to disgraceful and injurious conduct. Let me commend him to the monition of a solemn passage: "It must needs be that offences come but woe unto that man by whom they come."

This pseudo Africa must comfort himself with the memory of a few more examples of rejected advisers. The Methodist Church or Ministry will not accept his counsel. He has discovered his disqualification and unworthiness;—he has shown himself a vain, little and thin skinned soul, so easily burnt through, as with lunar caustic, by a few words dropped in the warmth of debate. The Ministers of the Liberia Conference will, consult the best interests of the church intrusted to their care and the glory of its Divine Head; they will also, consult their good and true friends on the other side the water; and, as much a part as possible from pride, and from passion, and from prejudice, will elect, if they think the time has come, a white man or a colored man, for episcopal ordination, or will not elect either, as seemeth best to their godly wisdom. And all things shall be done decently and in order.

METHODIST.

THE MADRID INSURRECTION.

We are as yet without complete details of the insurrection which broke forth at Madrid on the 14th, and in which not only the people, but the national guard, rose against the Government and the troops, and were finally defeated by them. A collision of the kind had been for some time inevitable, and General O'Donnell no doubt was prepared for it.

The more liberal of the Moderado party under O'Donnel had, since the last revolution, governed in harmony with the more moderate of the Liberals under Espartero. This combination had so far secured the tranquility of the country, and, we believe, might have continued to do so, could the Parliamentary Liberals but have learned to forget their old rancours. Unfortunately the more ardent among them, instead of prudently submitting to the alliance, did all in their power to dissolve it; though Espartero undoubtedly did his utmost to temper their zeal, and prove to them the folly of again exciting popular tumult. One of the modes employed by them was to get a parliamentary inquiry instituted into the corrupt pecuniary practices of the Queen Mother, Christina; and this inquest terminated not long since in the form of a report which seriously charged her, not only with converting a quantity of crown and state property to her own use, but with having illegally usurped power. By the law of Spain the widow of the King [redacted] if she has remarried; yet Christina, who married Munoz three months after the death of Ferdinand, kept this marriage secret in a legal and constitutional sense, while in order to comply with the decencies of society, she did not scruple at the same time to avow it. The Parliamentary Commission took advantage of all these contradictions to make out the case as bad as possible against Christina; and hence the fury of the Moderates, not only against its members, but against Espartero, who could not restrain his party, or more successfully protect the mother of his sovereign.

These taunts of the Moderados, together with the real reluctance of Espartero to protect a woman he despised, finally compelled to resign. The act at once proclaimed to Spain that the alliance between him and O'Donnell, between the Liberals and the Moderates, was at an end. It was what the extreme party most desired. They at once broke into open insurrection and this, we perceive, has been put down by O'Donnell and by the troops in Madrid, so far defeating all the calculations of those who had most desired the explosion.

We cannot but deeply regret the separation of Espartero and O'Donnell which led to this catastrophe, as well as the folly of those of the popular party who had immediate recourse to street insurrection. Had the movement succeeded, it might have been fatal to the Royal authority, and being opposed by all the Moderates, would have probably ended in republican excesses. This would have led to remonstrance from France, perhaps to quarrels with that Government, and a succession of evils and discords.

On the other hand, the victory of O'Donnell has its dangers. If he follow it up by moderate measures, not destructive of the constitution, and not too vindictive towards the conquered party, he may yet heal the bleeding wounds of the state, and repair this great disaster. But he must in that case alike resist the clamour of the reactionary party, the folly of the Court, and the demands of Christina. Should he on the contrary, give free way to the Court in its vengeance, to the army in its insolence, and to the furious Moderados in their reaction, the oppressed Liberals, though crushed in the capital, will make a stand in the provinces. If Espartero refuse to head them, they will find another leader; and Spain will be deluged with civil war.—The Examiner.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

THE DEATH KNELL OF QUACKERY.

"Oh b'essed Health! exclaims Sterne, 'tis thou "who enlargest the soul and openest all its pow-"ers to receive instruction and to relish virtue. "He that has thee has little else to wish for; he that is so wretched as to want thee, wants every thing with thee." The truth of this apostrophe every one must acknowledge; poor Sterne spoke from sad experience. And yet familiar as every man is with the truth herein expressed, no mortal could compute the numbers who ruin themselves in body, mind, and fortune, by neglecting to employ the proper remedies when Health fails. How is this neglect to be remedied? The evil has become so consecrated by age, that the man who undertake to amend it requires no ordinary hardihood, such a man is Professor Holloway.

The honest laborer in the cause of humanity finds no sadder discouragement, than in the complacent indifference with which people prefer rather to endure a long existing evil than to incur the trouble necessary to get rid of it. The more aged an error has become, the more difficult it is to remove it. This is true in an especial manner of the art of healing, as it was known and practised before the advent of this wonderful genius whose mission has been to re-establish the treatment of human ailments in a rational way.

One by one the venerable abuses that have disgraced the past are disappearing, and among the rest the errors that have crept into medical practice have got their dismission papers, and are obliged, [redacted] to edge run." Where, [redacted] Proofs why there is one great, patent, palpable fact which has been staring the world in the face for the last twenty years, and working its way through popular prejudice into popular favor with a success which is the most unquestionable evidence of its power as a proof. The medicines of Professor Holloway have been silently but powerfully effecting a change in the science of Physic which the world itself has begun to wonder at. It is well known that the causes of all the diseases, and sufferings to which people are subject are very few, although their indications may be numerously varied. The old plan of curing diseases was by affecting their results without affecting their primary causes. Professor Holloway initiated a new mode of treatment by the discovery of his Pills and Ointment which, whilst immediately grappling with the ultimate symptoms, reach also to the seat of the disease, and eradicate the first causes, thus destroying all subsequent liability to similar affections. We do not mean to praise these Pills and Ointment. We confine ourselves to stating facts, and are perfectly satisfied that no eulogy is needed. They speak for themselves.—Pennsylvania Enquirer.

The sinking of the cable, which is to complete the telegraphic communication between France and Algeria, will commence on the 20th.—

Holloway's Ointment and Pills. certain Remedies for Rheumatism.—Henry Foot, aged 52, of Calcutta, was a severe sufferer from this complaint, and tried a number of reputed remedies, hoping they would benefit him, but he became so bad at last, as to be entirely confined to his bed, and he was unable to move either hand or foot. While he was in this horrible condition, a friend brought him a quantity of Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which he immediately commenced to use, he soon found himself gradually improved by them, and by persevering with them for eleven weeks, he was entirely cured, and has since enjoyed the best of health.

THE LATE EMPEROR NICHOLAS.

We find the following amusing account of the courtship of the late Emperor Nicholas from the Presbyterian Herald.

About the year 1816 the Grand Duke Nicholas came to Berlin to see if one of the Prussian Princesses would suit him, and the Princess Charlotte was given to understand by her parents that if he should take a fancy to her they would have no objection to her returning the penchant. The time originally fixed for the expiration of the Grand Duke's stay had come, and he was seated at supper on his last evening next to the Princess Charlotte, when he abruptly told her that he must leave Berlin the next day. He hoped to surprise her into some demonstration of feeling on the occasion, but her maidenly pride withheld her from making more than some very say-nothing remark in acknowledgement.

The Grand Duke thereupon soon assumed another plan of operations; knowing that, however little the eyes of the company might be actually fixed on him and his fair neighbor, they were, nevertheless the object of general observation, he commenced telling her, but in an apparently unembarrassed manner, and playing with a ring, of his the while, that he had devoted himself during his short stay there, to making himself, acquainted with her, character and disposition, &c., and that he had found in her every quality that he beleived best calculated to make him happy in wedded life, &c.; but, as they two were at that moment the object of scrutiny to many present, he would not press her for any reply to his overtures, but if it was agreeable to her that he should prolong his stay at her father's court, she would, perhaps, have the goodness to take up the ring he had in his hand. This ring he then, apparently while playing with the two objects, thrust into the roll of bread lying on the table before him, and went on, seemingly in all sang froid, with his supper.—With an equal appearance of unconcern the princess presently put out her hand, and took up the roll, as if mistaking it for her own bread, and, unnoticed by the company, withdrew the ring, and put it on her own hand. The rest requires no narration.

A second Trajan's column, after the model of that in the Place Vendome, is recommended for this monument in memory of the victories of the new grande armee and the genius of the new Napoleon.

The site proposed for this column is on the Boulevard de Sebastopol from the Strasbourg Railway to the Barriere d'Enfer.

Measures, it is said are in course of operation to annul the marriage between Princess Mathilde and Prince Anatole de Demidoff.

[redacted] official return of the receipts of the taxes and [redacted] revenue for the first six months of 1856 [redacted] 499,752.000f; being an increase of 56, 770,000f. on the corresponding period of 1855.

The 'Debats' states that Prince Mentchikoff's travelling carriage, which was taken by the English at Almb, is now in Paris, where after having passed through several hands, it was sent for sale.

NOTICE.

An Eating House now opened on the corner of Broad street and Gurley street where meals, and lunches, can be had at order from six A. M. to nine P. M. Mr. Powers invites the ladies, and gents. to come and look for themselves; all pains will be taken to give satisfaction to all who may call.

SAMUEL POWERS.

The Grand Duke Michael of Russia has been betrothed at Wildbad to Princess Cecilia, youngest sister of the Prince Regent of Baden.

Prince Stirbey, Hospodar of Wallachia, has abdicated his Government. His powers as hospodar has already expired.

The Ionian merchants settled at Patras have signed a petition to the British Government to send a vessel of war there for their protection.

STOP AND THINK.

Stop and think, oh sinful man!
Trifle not your days away
Gaze upon the wonderous plan,
Christ achieved your sins to stay.

Gaze and wonder as you stand,
Pause and think, your sins he bore,
When He died for sinful man,
That they may live forever more.

Think for you His blood was spilt,
On that sad and mournful day;
To cleanse your soul from every guilt,
And wash the sinful stain away.

Pause and listen hear your God,
When He gained the wond'rous plan,
Yielding to Justice angry rod,
"I died to save rebellious man."

Sinner pause look and see!
Jesus Christ now ready stand,
You from guilt and sin he'll free,
Guide you to the heavenly land.

Hasten then your Saviour calls
"Sinner come to me and live,
I will save you from the fall
I will true salvation give."

Go then to your Saviour now,
He will true salvation give,
On your knees go humbly bow,
Look to Him and you will live.

YE MUST NOT WEEP FOR ME.

1. When it is said,
Around my bed,
That I am dead,
Shed not a tear.

2. We all must go;
The high the low
Know it is so,
Then why the tears.

3. The sad the gay,
Know every day—
Some pass away,
To the spirit land.

4. Then God of power,
Help us to soar
In that trying hour,
Up to thy right hand.

5. Death cannot sting
Nor terrors bring
Since Christ the King
Hath died for me.

6. The grave gives peace,
There tumults cease—
Man's sure release
Whose hopes on Thee

7. In righteous death,
I'd yield my breath,
To Him who saith
"Be born again"

8. Why should I stay,
There's no dismay,
In coming day
With him to reign.

SPECULATION IN FRANCE.

England and France are legislating in contrary directions on the important subject of commercial association. England no longer restricts the employment of the money of many with the responsibility of all, having seen the necessity of relaxing a rigour in the [illegible] which prevented poor men from [illegible] their small capital, and favoured too [illegible] monopoly of the rich. France, on the other hand, has found the disadvantage in its present circumstances of too great a degree of liberty; and the Emperor has been compelled to abridge, by a very severe law, the facilities for the formation of anonymous companies.

Both countries may undergo inconvenience from meddling with so great and universal an agent as money, but the motives operating in both cases are manifest enough. The continued division of property in France is such that hardly anything can be done there by individual capital or enterprise, whereas in England the means of employing small capitals had borne no proportion whatever to the facilities for creating them.

In England has existed, time out of mind, a large and important class, possessed of enterprise and knowledge, both of which they devoted to the cultivation, quite apart from the possession, of the soil. The capital gained and accumulated in their thrifty hands has been for the greated part employed in the same industry and the same calling: and one has but to look round with pride on the results of such individual enterprise and skill, applied to the soil of England.

France, on the contrary, has no such race. Whatever tendency may have existed in its corresponding class to farm was prevented, first, by the aristocracy, who would neither give freedom nor fair condition, and secondly, by the revolution. The cultivator of the French soil is its possessor, who, assailed by all the cares and temptations of proprietorship, seldom or ever is able to make land a foundation for commercial enterprise, or for money making. He lives on it, and that suffices. At every death one brother seeks to buy the portion of the other, and runs into debt to do so. Instead therefore of the cultivator having money to employ on the land, he is obliged to extract money to pay interest of borrowed capital, and to feed himself besides. This created a system of its own, and a bad system, no doubt: still it went on in a regular channel, and with certain ascertainable results. All who had money, or who could save money in the provinces, lent it to the landed proprietor as long as he could pay interest; and when he could no longer do so, the rustic capitalist became proprietor himself, his children becoming indebted in their turn.

All this machinery, however, has been destroyed, and all these habits broken in upon, since the rise and extension of commercial enterprises in shares, which have absorbed not merely the money of the town capitalist in speculation, but also that of the provincial. In addition to the railroads, which of course interested each locality, and carried off great part of its money, Government itself appeared with its loans, and gathered up the savings of the peasant, who on seeing the funds rise and realising a little profit, straightway acquired the greed for stock jobbing. The result of this, and of its consequences in multiplying societes en commandite and anonymous companies, has been entirely to carry away the fund hitherto reserved for the necessities of the agriculturist. In short, what between failure of crops and dearth of money, increased taxes and prices and inadequate production the numerous class of French landed proprietors are in deplorable condition.

To arrest the madness of speculation, to cause to flow back to the rustic rivulet the capital which has rushed into the great town channels, forms now one of the great solicitudes of the Imperial Government; and well it may, for its own measures and domestic outlay have immensely developed and augmented the evil. Hence all the laws submitted lately to the so called Legislative body, for giving millions to draining, for checking the erection of companies with capital in shares, and so on. All are efforts in the direction of meeting an evil most directly created by the Government itself. The Imperial system has drained the country of its men and its money, both of which it has tempted to migrate to the town. Were all such industrious gamblers and speculators, indeed, really prosperous, one might in time see the money realised by them pour back in a fertilising stream upon the country. But either the hour has not arrived, or the gambling is not really prosperous. There is a vast difference beween the genuine enterprise which creates wealth, and the mock one which consists in robbing it from one's dupes and neighbours.

There is great expenditure in France, especially in Paris, there is great activity, great increase of prices, most abundant accumulating of salaries, in a word, there are all the external signs of prosperity. But every one can see that nothing of this reposes on a solid basis, on the real creation or economy of wealth; and it remains to be seen whether the laws by which it is now sought to check the mania of speculation will bring any effectual remedy for the [illegible] and growing evil.—The Examiner.

[illegible] following [illegible] from the Sierra Leone "New Era" of August 23rd, being a memorial of Sir Edward Buxton to Lord Palmerston, for the propagating of civilization in Africa. This memorial says the "New Era" met with a very favorable reception.

THE undersigned having long taken a deep interest in the Christian civilization of Africa, and its effectual deliverance from the evils of the Slave Trade, beg leave to submit to her Majesty's Government the following Statement:—

1. That the trade with the West Coast of Africa, independently of its beneficial influence in suppressing the Slave Trade, is of great and increasing importance to this country: for the confirmation of which they beg to refer to the Statistical Returns appended to this Memorial.

2. That the published accounts of the successful Expedition up the rivers Niger and Tshadda, in the year 1854, undertaken at the instance and under the auspices of Her Majesty's Government, show that great advantages would accrue to the commerce of West Africa, if this natural highway into the interior of that Continent were effectually opened and kept open for a few years.

3. That the late expedition has also shown that the fatality which attended the Expedition in 1841, may be in a great degree, at least, obviated by choosing a proper season of ascent, and by improved medical treatment; since, though the expedition was for nearly four months in the rivers, not a single case of serious illness occurred to a crew of 12 Europeans and 54 Natives.

4. That it appears to your Memorialists that all the prospect of introducing Civilization and Christianity into Africa, by the Navigation of the rivers Niger and Tshadda, which led her Majesty's Government to send out at a great cost the Expedition of 1841, still exist; and that they should be promptly improved by this country, before they are closed by any change of circumstances, or taken out of our hands by other nation.

5. Your Memorialists are convinced that it is essential to the success of any plans for the attainment of this object by means of Native agency, that Her Majesty's Government should establish or promote the establishment of a regular Steam Communication between Fernando Po and the confluence of the Niger and Tshadda rivers in order that Native Traders may be assured that the way will be kept open; and also that her Majesty's Government should, at periodical intervals, extend such communication further up the two rivers, with a view to the extension of geographical discovery of commercial enterprize, and of religious civilization in the interior of Africa.

6. That should Her Majesty's Government accede to this proposal, there is every prospect of the completion of the great and benevolent object in view, by the spontaneous commercial enterprize of liberated and other Africans in the various Settlements upon the West Coast, and by the zeal of Missionary Societies.

7. That the prospect of thus introducing lawful commerce, Civlization, and Christianity, into this part of Africa, are greatly strengthened by the example of one powerful and enterprising nation, called the Yoruba nation whose country occupies the chief districts lying between the Bight of Benin and the River Niger which, within the last ten years has made rapid progress in social improvement, chiefly through the immigration of their liberated countrymen from Sierra Leone, and by the residence of Missionaries amongst them. A statement respecting this nation is appended to this Memorial, and your Memorialists have reason to know that there are large numbers of this Tribe, and of the Ibo Tribe, now in Sierra Leone, ready to take advantage of the opening of the Niger to lawful commerce, by immigrating to those part for the purposes of Trade.

8. Lastly, in the prospect of an extension of the West African Trade, that it will be of great importance to make Sierra Leone a Free Port; it being the only harbour upon a coast line of at least 2000 miles. A letter from Macgregor Laird, Esq. upon this point, is appended to this Memorial.

Your Memorialists therefore humbly pray, that Her Majesty's Government will adopt measures both for promoting British commerce and civilization, and to effectually suppressing all remaining Slave-trade, upon the West African Coast; and they submit the following measures as especially conducive to these ends

(1) To maintain the African Squadron in the state of efficiency which it had attained before the breaking out of the Russian war, when the Slave Trade along the whole West African Coast was reported to be virtually extinct.

(2) To provide, as a branch of the duties of the West African Squadron, or in some other way, the sending of a small steamer up the Niger, to the confluence, each season, for the next five or seven years, to give confidence and encouragement to any trading settlments which may be formed of emigrants from Sierra Leone, or other parts of the Coast;—and to protect lawful traders from the marauding tribes which infest the Delta of the Niger.

(3) To secure to British Traders a free use of some Port, either at Fernando Po, by a commercial treaty with Spain, or in some other locality, of which several might be selected in the neighborhood of the Cameroons, as an entreport for British Merchant ships.

(4) To place a small War-Steamer upon the River or Lagoon on which the Island of Lagos is situated, which would give the command of the waters running parallel to the coast for nearly 200 miles—which are now used by Slave boats to dodge and escape the Cruisers on the coast.

(5) Lastly, in the prospect of an extension of the West African Trade, to make Sierra Leone a Free Port.

[illegible]

FRANCE.—PARTIAL RESTITUTION TO THE ORLEANS FAMILY.—The Government has resolved to make a certain extent of restitution, at the public expence, to some of the members of the Orleans family, who were stripped of their property by the confiscation decree of 1852. The bill now before the Council of State proposes that from the 22nd, inst., the following sums shall be inscribed upon the grand book of the public debt, 200,000fr. Rente in the names of the heirs of Marie Therese d'Orleans, Queen of the Belgians; 200,000fr. in the name of the the Princess Marie Clementine d'Orleans, Duchess of Saxe Coburg-Gotha, and 200,000fr. in the names of the heirs of the Princess Marie Chirstine of Orleans, Duchess of Wurtemberg. The expose des motifs sets forth as the reason for the measure the conditions of the marriage contracts between Louis Philippe and his sons in-law. There are a great many lawsuits pending, which would have caused the the Government great annoyance by continually bringing the confiscation question on the tapis. It has therefore been thought prudent to make the state pay a good round sum to make things pleasant.—Ib.

STATE OF AFFAIRS IN LOMBARDY AND NAPLES—Accounts from Milan of the 11st, mention that a movement on a large scale, indeed on the whole line of the Italian Peninsula, is in course of preparation Copies of incendiary proclamation exciting to pillage an assassination, are circulated throughout Italy. Letters from Naples describe the King as more determined each day to decline the counsels of the Western Powers and refuse the reforms demanded from him as the only chance of saving his States from violent, commotion. He has become more morose and less communicative, and will not listen to any advice. He flatters himself, however, that he will be able to resist what he terms "the oppression of the Western Powers," with the help of the Lazzaroni in whose fidelity he has every confidence. A fresh political trial, known by the name of the "Processo Mignogna," commenced on the 7th. of the month, before the Criminal Court of Naples, and was still going on on the 14th. The accused are eleven in number, among whom were two lawyers, two priests, one friar, and one woman. The details disclosed during the trial are shocking. As an instance, the following was stated in public court (and not contradicted by the Attorney General) by one of the accused, who had been a prisoner in the Bagno di Procida. It is necessary to premise that no person confined in that bagno may send a letter without its being stamped by the governor of the gaol. One day the governor of the Bagno di Procida, being drunk forgot to stamp many letters which were sent out. The official at the entrance of the bagno who is charged with the control of the letters, seeing that some letters were not stamped, took them back to the governor, who, forgetting that he was the real cause of the neglected formality, ordered all the prisoners to receive 100 blows of a stick in the course of five hours. The number of those persons amounted to seventy-two; so, that in five hours 7200 blows were inflicted on innocent men.—The Examiner.

AMERICAN OFFICIAL COSTUME.—A contre-temps occurred at the Queen's levee on Wednesday, the facts of which are stated by the 'Daily News' to be these:—Mr. Dallas and his diplomatic subordinates were in their ordinary diplomatic costume. The United States Minister was accompanied by the Professor of Military Science in one of the United States professional establishments. This gentleman wore his ordinary and proper military uniform, consisting of a military frock coat, white waistcoat, and black stock, such as he presents himself in before his military superiors, and that he especially selected this as the proper costume in which to appear at her Majesty's levee, for presentation by the Minister of his Government. On being refused admission by the Master of the Ceremonies, Mr. Dallas retired, with great regret at the occurrence. The conduct of the Queen on the occasion was exactly what might have been expected from her excellent sense and presence of mind. When informed by Lord Clarendon of what had happened, her Majesty at once replied, 'Let the gentleman be admitted: I shall be happy to receive him in any costume. Unfortunately, however, before the Queen's gracious directions could be delivered, the party had left the Palace."—Ib.

THE EMPEROR'S OPINION OF BOURSE SPECULATIONS.—The Emperor has sent the following letter to M. Ponsard, author of 'La Bourse,' the successful comedy lately produced at the Odeon, on the occasion of that gentleman having sent to his Majesty a copy of the work:—"Palace of St. Cloud, 15th, June. Monsieur—You thought it advisable after the first representation of 'La Bourse,' to withdraw it from the felicitations of the public and from mine. The presentation of a copy of your new work now gives me an opportunity of congratulating you, which I do most willingly, for I have been really happy to hear you denounce and combat with all the authority of your talent, and under the inspiration of the most noble sentiments, the deplorable mania of the day. I shall therefore peruse your piece with the same pleasure that I experienced at its first performance. Persevere, Monsieur, in that path of morality to which your success binds you, but which is perhaps too rarely followed on the stage, though it is worthy of authors destined, like yourself, to enjoy a great reputation. Believe in all my kind wishes.—NAPOLEON."

LIBERIA HERALD.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the Honorable.—

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The period having arrived at which the law of this Republic makes it my duty to meet you, it affords me great pleasure to do so, for the purpose of making representation to your honorable department, of the foreign and domestic affairs of this Republic; as also of recommending such public measures, as I have deemed expedient under existing circumstances.

We have great cause to feel profoundly grateful to the Father of all our mercies, for his preserving care and direction of us and our public affairs through the course of another year, which has been marked by difficulties and dangers of no ordinary nature

The ushering in of my administrative term, was a juncture fraught with many disadvantages and discouragements. About six weeks previously, at a time when this government, and especially that county, were illy prepared for such an event, a most distressing civil war had broken out between the Americo Liberians of Sinoe County, and the aboriginal tribes, known as the Grand and Little Butaw, the Sinoe and the Blue Barree tribes inhabiting said county; which, for some time, threatened the extinction of our settlements in that section of this Republic. Three of the interior settlements had been abandoned; and two others, partly destroyed by the flames of the enemy, were but feebly occupied as outer stations. The crops were nearly all destroyed;—all inland communication, and consequently such supplies as the country usually afforded, were cut off; thus suddenly rendering four fifths of the Americo Liberians in that interesting county entirely dependent on charity for food and raiment, at a time when foreign and domestic provisions were more than fifty per cent higher than usual; so that the extinction of the settlements in that interesting county by war and its concomitants seemed inevitable, and was pretty generally apprehended.

But we have great cause to feel grateful, that Divine Providence has mercifully dispelled during the year, most of the clouds that presented such a portentous aspect, and has measurably caused a genial and encouraging sunshine of security, prosperity, independence and contentedness to ensue.

The military campaign authorized and requested by you, at the last session, to be put on foot, for the purpose of chastising the aggressive tribes of Sinoe county, and for the protection of our settlements there, has been faithfully and effectually prosecuted under the able command of General John N. Lewis. The first Regiment (Col. Payne,) sailed from this port on the 26th of January; and the second regiment (Col. J. D. Washington,) from Grand Bassa, on the 24th of the same month for Sinoe, where they were joined by the third regiment, (Col. S. Dickerson,) and took up the line of march on the 31st., to operate against the Grand and Little Butaw, the Sinoe and Blue Barre tribes, and by the 23d of February, had inflicted such a chastisement, as was necessary to carry out the object contemplated by the Act; and on the 26th February embarked for home, having sustained very little numerical loss. In the prosecution of that campaign, (which, properly speaking, was but the suppression of an insurrection of heathens,) the policy was to adhere as closely as possible to that humane principle in international law, which enjoins "To do the enemy as little harm and as much good in time of war, as may under existing circumstances, accord with a sound discretion."

Considering gentlemen, the relation we sustain to aboriginal Liberia, our great duties, responsibilities and brilliant hopes with respect to their future social, political, and religious welfare, it was generally regretted that measures so revolting to our feelings had to be resorted to for our own, as well as their safety and benefit.

The great pressure of business consequent upon the incipiency of my administrative term, prevented my revisiting Sinoe after the return of the troops, until the 11th of June, when I was happy to find that Judge Murray, associates with Commissioners, had, on the ninth, two days previously, concluded a satisfactory peace in Greenville with the Grand and Little Butaw tribes; and during my stay there, I succeeded on terms mutually satisfactory, in negotiating peace with the Blue Barree and Sinoe Chiefs, who met me in the court house at Greenville for that purpose. Copies of the terms of peace will be duly laid before the Honorable, the Senate, in which it will appear that reasonable indemnities were exacted of them; reparations sufficiently stringent, when taken in connection with the chastisement they had already received, to cause them to reflect seriously in the future before perpetrating similar aggressions; and from their general expressions of regret, exhibitions of humility, and solemn promises of future good behaviour and loyalty, I cannot doubt, if a judicious course is observed by the Americo Liberians, that that county will rest from war at least a score of years, if not perpetually. In order, however, to contribute to the perpetuation of peace, I advise that provision be made, so soon as our pecuniary circumstances will allow, for putting the settlements there, as well as elsewhere within the Republic, in a state of defence.

A great number of our fellow citizens inhabiting that county have long since returned to their deserted villages and homes with new life and zeal, and are praiseworthily laying the foundation of a permanent prosperity and independence.

During my visit to Sinoe, I dispatched Capt., Crayton, via Butaw, with friendly assurances to Joe Weah, an interior Chief, with whom for many years we have been on the most friendly terms; the obstruction of whose intercourse to our settlements by the Butaws, who had been waging war against him for several years for that purpose, has proven very retarding to the prosperity of our settlements for years; and the interposition of this government so as to establish free intercourse, contributed in a great measure to the assumption, by the Butaw tribes, of the late hostile attitude towards us. These friendly assurances were cordially reciprocated by Joe Weah and tribes contiguous, and a proposition was made by him, and an understanding had, that, as former obstructions were now removed, a good road be opened from our settlements to his town; in the prosecution of which he pledged the co-operation of his people. It is said by those who have visited it, to be a healthy, fertile, well-watered and timbered country, furnishing an abundance of rice at all seasons, and with contiguous sections abounding with many valuable commodities.

I visited Grand Cape Mount early in May, for the purpose of regulating matters at Robertsport, as well as to bring about a cessation of hostilities among the seabord tribes of that country. I am happy to inform you that I succeeded in making peace between the two principal belligerents, George Cane and Far Forney; and the long obstructed intercourse between them was re-opened and has not been obstructed since: both Chiefs have since died; the former last month, and the later during the month of June.

The term of the enlistment of the volunteers to Robertsport having expired on the first of April, they had become discouraged by the impoverished state of the country induced by constant war; and their discouragement was augmented by their continued disappointment, in an accession by immigration; but I could not for a moment entertain the idea of an abandonment of that promising settlement, after so large an expenditure by government for its establishment. I had therefore, to assume the responsibility of continuing their rations for four months beyond the original term of enlistment—by which time, I indulged the hope that the settlement would be strengthed by immigration—with the understanding that they remain there as permanent settlers. I also assured them, should circumstances require them to be called into actual service up there this year, I had no doubt that you would authorize their adequate compensation.

Though it is possible, we may find it necessary at some future day, to chastise some of the more interior tribes of that section of country, for persisting in the prosecution of their predatory wars, on which they have so long depended for livelihood, yet for the present, it is a very highly gratifying fact, that peace so generally prevails within our borders, and that the aborigines are manifestly increasing in their respect for, and loyalty to this government; and are encouragingly progressing in those principles of civilization that are destined to elevate them to social and religious blessings, as well as to national greatness.

During the month of March, I sent up a surveyor to lay out the city of Robertsport, who returned in the month of May, with a certificate from the General Superintendent, stating that four hundred and sixteen lots had been laid off. I am happy to say, that about one hundred of the immigrants by the Elvira Owen were landed there early in September, under the supervision of the Rev. John Seys, Special Agent of the American Colonization Society; and one of the fine commodious receptacles brought out by the same vessel, has been erected at that place for the accommodation of successive companies of immigrants. The volunteers and immigrants have drawn their town lots, and are praiseworthily converting that wilderness into civilized habitations. I know of no seaboard settlement in Liberia possessing more and greater advantages. As it was deemed advisable that the farms be apportioned off lands up the country, which can be reached by ascending the bay and river, I have deferred their assignment until such time as the present settlement shall have acquired sufficient numerical force for self protection; meanwhile there is sufficient public land contiguous to Robertsport, that the settlers can cultivate for the present with more convenience, profit and safety.

I beg to invite your attention to the propriety of making suitable provisions for the administration and government of the local affairs at Cape Mount.

In case you are pleased to constitute it a distinct county, in compliance with the petition of its inhabitants, and will invest it with the usual county officers and organizations, then my duty will be plain: but should it not be made a seperate county, then it will be necessary for you to make special provisions for the administration and government of their local affairs, so as to obviate in some degree, the great inconvenience and expense that would in such case result from their being so distant from the county seat, and the poor facilities for communication and transportation. In either case, I advise that you constitute Robertsport a port of entry and delivery.

The Rev. John Seys, well known as a devoted christian missionary for a long time in Liberia, arrived in the ship Elvira Owen in the month of August, as Special Agent of the American Colonization Society; and among other important duties, he is charged with the mission, by permission of this government, of making exploration interior, for the purpose of selecting a suitable locality for the formation of an interior settlement, with a view of testing the comparative healthiness of our seaboard and interior in the acclimation of immigrants. This laudable enterprise was originated some years ago, by the New Jersey Colonization Society; but circumstances have prevented its prosecution hitherto. I am sanguine that its prosecution under well considered and judicious provisions meets your cordial approbation: and as this government has not as yet, to my knowledge, formally signified its concurrence in the measure, I beg to invite your attention to it at this session. I have already advised the Society of the propriety of a sufficient expenditure by them, in order to provide adequately for the security of said settlement. I shall be pleased to carry out any recommendation of yours in this matter.

I beg to invite your attention, at an early day of your session, to the communication of the 19th of April 1855, addressed to the President of this Republic by Governor Wright, President of the State Board of Colonization of Indiana, in reference to their procurement of land in Liberia at a fixed price, for the purpose of making additional grants to immigrants from that State, to the quantity of land allowed immigrants by the existing laws of Liberia; as also soliciting information on other important matters connected with the future operations of said Society. As the operations of the Board have no doubt been retarded in consequence of your action on that communication not having been consummated at your last session, and as a reply will be awaited with some anxiety, at an early day after this commencement of your session, I beg that you will give it your earliest attention.

I have also to invite your attention to the matter in dispute between the Ex-Collector of Customs of this port, and Capt. Josiah Webber, of Salem Mass., U. S. A., in reference to an amount of duties he was required to pay on a quantity of ardent spirits landed in this Republic after the first day of May 1855, on which he claims to have paid duties previously, under the operation of the law immediately preceding that date; and he now asks a refundment of the last amount paid; and as this can be done only by a special act of yours, I believe that the subject will receive such attention and action as justice demands. As this matter was submitted to you at the last session, and remains among the unfinished business, you are in possession of the documents connected therewith.

In the month of August, there were furnished by the Secretary of State to H. B. M. Government, on official appplication, the tariff of this Republic, also the value of the different foreign coins circulating within the same. The latter, in the absence of any statute fixing their value, were based upon usage. I advise the regulation of their value within this Republic by law at this session, so as to secure a legal uniformity in their valuation throughout the State. I also beg, that you will constitute the copper coin, procured by this government partly through the beneficence of the late lamented S. Gurney, Esq., a legal tender of this Republic; and that you will authorize the issue and circulation of such an amount of the engraved bills of this Republic, as you may deem accordant with a sound policy under existing circumstances.

I have to call your attention to the "Bounty land bill," which passed both houses nearly at the close of your last session; the which, from some objectionable features and provisions, was not approved. Without adverting to all I consider objectionable in it, I will simply invite your attention to the fact, that the Act actually places it out of the power of its intended beneficiaries to dispose of their bounty lands, in case they wish to do so; which I cannot believe to have been the intention of the framers of the bill, but was an oversight, through the great pressure and hurry at the time of its passage. This feature would render at least two thirds of the claims entirely unavailing to the claimants, for reasons too manifest to need mentioning here. I beg therefore, your reconsideration of the bill, and that you make such amendments as will carry out more satisfactorily, the very commendable object contemplated.

I have also to recommend the passage of a law defining citizenship of this Republic; that is, as to what shall constitute one a citizen of this Republic; as well as making provisions for carrying the same into effect. The passage of such a law should not be delayed longer, if we would obviate serious difficulties, not only among ourselves, but with foreign powers; a warning against which, we have had this year, in the attempt of the notorious A. T. Woods.

I have to further recommend, that you so amend the act entitled "An Act authorizing the appointment of surveyors for each County, and defining their duties," approved January 30th, 1855, as to require persons who may order land surveyed through the Land Commissioner, to pay the expense of surveying the same, provided the person thus ordering does not appear and have the said land sold at the succeeding Quartely Court; and that the Land Commissioner be authorized to adopt such measures, as will insure its prompt and immediate collection.

The increase of cases of larceny within the Republic the last two years manifestly proves, that the statutory provisions made for its punishment, approved January 9th 1851, are not sufficiently stringent. The bare requisition of fourfold if detected, will likely always prove a temptation to the committal of such acts, by the dishonest, acute speculator. If the thief can satisfy himself, that the chances of his escape are good for five out of six, he will be encouraged to prosecute the business for a livelihood. It is highly important gentlemen, that the law at once be made more effective, so as to timely check this growing evil.

I have to request your authorization of the appointment of one or more discreet persons in each county, whose duty it shall be to hear and determine such native complaints and misunderstandings as are usually referred to the Chief Executive; and that you define the duties and jurisdiction of these officers, as well as the compensation of such of them, as may not be the regularly appointed general Superintendents of Counties. And as the aborigines living adjacent to our settlements perform no public duty, nor contribute otherwise directly to the support of the government; and as they claim and receive the protection of this government, which on an average, spends thousands of dollars annually, settling their misunderstandings one with another, and in affording them protection, I therefore recommend, that a reasonable tax be imposed on them, to assist in defraying these expenses; and that you define and authorize the organization of a system that will promptly and effectually secure the desired object.

Gentlemen, I have also to invite your attention, in a somewhat cursory manner, to the propriety of making the following amendments and additions to the Judiciary code. I deem it unnecessary to offer any arguments in commendation of them, as they will no doubt readily commend themselves to your experienced, and discriminating judgments.

1st. A law defining the method by which suits shall be brought against this government. vide 17th Section of the Bill of Rights.

2nd. A law of descent; or hereditary succession.'

3rd. A law requiring, within a given time, the public record of conveyances and other documents involving title to land, in order to their validity.

4th. A law providing for a more efficient organization of the Militia of this Republic. "

It affords me great pleasure to communicate to you, that nothing has occured during the year to interrupt the tranquility of our foreign relations; and so far as I am cognizant, the most friendly feelings subsist between this government and all nations. This very desirable state of things has been greatly contributed to by the very commendable deportment of the foreign functionaries residing in the Republic, who, while they have zealously guarded the interest of their respective governments, have so demeaned themselves, as to have secured the confidence, respect and best feelings of this government.

In the month of June, Dr. J. Z. Forney, Esqr, arrived in this city, bearing a commission of United States' Commercial Agent for Monrovia and parts adjacent; and was received by this government in the month of July, after the requisite correspondence and understanding were had with him. Any further information, gentlemen, you may require with respect to this matter will be duly laid before you.

I have the pleasure of informing you, that ratifications of the Hanseatic treaty were exchanged in London by G. Ralston, Esqr, on behalf of this government, on the 13th of May; copies of which have been duly received at the State department.

In the month of April last, the Hon. J. J. Roberts, intending to make a visit to Europe, was commissioned Charge des Affairs of this government, accredited near the Court of His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor of France; and having been duly recognized by that magnanimous nation, was enabled through his efficient ministry, to make such representations of the character, object, and claims of this infant Republic, as could not fail to make a true and favourable impression.

His Majesty, true to that magnanimity and benevolence that have hitherto characterized his reign, entertained up to the date of his last advices from our Minister, his wonted feelings of friendship towards this infant Republic, and evinced a disposition to contribute to its welfare.

The special duties with which our Minister was charged, were to exchange ratifications of the French treaty; to procure of the French government the gift of the promised small vessel of war, and to adjust and settle the claims of our Consul-general at Paris. I regret that he has not been able to consummate the prosecution of all these duties timely, for me to make full report to you of the same, at this commencement of your session

I have the gratification however, of informing you that he succeeded in settling the claims made on this government by our Consul-general at Paris, by the payment of two hundred and fifty dollars in addition to the thousand dollars appropriated for that purpose at your last session; of which I beg your approval. Through the kindness of Mr. Woermann of Hamburg, the theatre and uniforms presented by the French government have been shipped for this city, and are daily expected.

I am happy to inform you, that on the arrival of the Elvira Owen, I received, through the agency of the American Colonization Society, a valuable library, with surgical instruments and human skeleton, (constituting nine cases,) which were bequeathed to this Republic by the late lamented Dr Kittredge, of Portsmouth, N. H., who, I learn has been Liberia's unswerving friend for many years. This bequest is valued at five thousand dollars, and I am sure, will ever be gratefully remembered, and duly appreciated by this government.

I also received early in the year, from Liberia's unrivaled and well known benefactor Benjamin Coates, Esqr. a large and beautiful lithographic picture of the Senate of the United States in 1850, which he kindly presents to the Honorable, the Senate of this Republic.

It gives me great pleasure to be able to state further, that through the instrumentality of the Rev. A. Crummel, who communicated with friends in the United States on that subject, an amount has been generously contributed for the erection of a library building in this city; and I am fully authorized by the donors to commence the same so soon as procurement of a lot for that purpose can be made of government. The Rev. gentleman accordingly made application to me for a lot nearly four months ago; and in course of conversation it occured to me, that notwithstanding he is not as yet advised as to their plans relative to the control and management of the library, yet, as it cannot be reasonably supposed, that it will be of a private or sectarian character, but is simply the product of benevolent hearts for the general good of Liberia, you would readily allow its erection on the corner, or some other spot of the government square, as being the most convenient and suitable place. I will, at an early day, transmit to you a copy of the Rev. gentleman's communication with me on the subject; and as the work has been delayed several months for the purpose of procuring your formal consent to its erection there. I am sanguine gentlemen, that you have not the least disposition to retard a moment longer, an enterprise so very laudable,—so very pregnant with blessings to the present, as well as future generations of this Republic.

I have the gratification to inform you, that in conformity to an act entitled "An Act authorizing the settling of land difficulties in the settlement of Caldwell, and survey of lands in all the settlements of this Republic, where difficulties exist," approved January 29th, 1855, I have succeeded, through the obliging disposition and efficient services of the Hon D B Warner, Secretary of state, in settling the most intricate land difficulties at Clay Ashland and vicinity, and I have made new assignments to most of those who have been ousted by the adjustment. I also appointed two commissioners for Caldwell in September, as provided in the said act, who finished their labors and issued the necessary certificates by the first of October; and the surveyor has been employed more than a fortnight resurveying that township, and surveying the farm lands to be apportioned, agreeable to the provisions of the said act.

I also have the gratification of communicating to you, that in conformity to an act entitled "An Act authorizing a just apportionment of land to be surveyed for the citizens at New Georgia," approved January 30th. 1855, I have had eighty seven farms, comprising four hundred and ninety eight acres, laid off in the vicinity of New Georgia; and apportionments have been made to those New Georgians who were found deficient of the quantity to which they were by law entitled.

I made the effort, as soon as I could this year, to have your resolution executed, which passed at your last session, authorizing and requesting the compilation of the laws of the Republic, including those of that session, together with our treaties &c, &c. I am happy to say that Major Erskine, whose services I was fortunate to secure as compiler, is progressing finely. I have contracted to have a thousand copies printed, one third of which have already passed through the press; and unless the work be delayed by your order, so as to include the laws of this session in the volume, the entire printing will have been finished before the close of this session.

It is also my duty to inform you, that in compliance with your resolution, approved January 11th, 1856, authorizing the purchase of a President's Mansion, the Secretary of the Treasury under my direction contracted for, and purchased the mansion of the Ex-President, at a cost of Eleven thousand dollars, to be paid in annual installments of one thousand dollars, and six per cent interest. Two thousand dollars of the amount have been paid this year, leaving now a balance of nine thousand The purchase includes nearly two town lots. It is a building which, with occasional repairs, will serve the purpose of this government for many years to come. I shall communicate with you further with respect to this building before the close of your session.

Captain Reid Cooper, of the Lib. government Schooner Lark, represents that vessel as needing a thorough repair, which she must necessarily undergo before the ensuing rains, provided she is to remain on this coast next year. It is almost impossible to give her such a repair on this coast as she needs; and I am not as yet cognizant of any means by which we can have the desirable object effected in England or the United States; though her commander states that she can safely make a voyage to either of those countries during the ensuing summer. Should our Minister to France succeed in procuring a small vessel-of-war from His Majesty, it will not entirely supersede the necessity of the repair for the Lark has been too useful, and is now too fine a vessel to be suffered to go to wreck. I solicit therefore, your favorable consideration of the estimate and communication with respect to her, that will be laid before you at a convenient day of your session.

I have also to state, that the counties of Grand Bassa and Sinoe stand very much in need of a jail each. The expense of government of renting private premises in the County of Grand Bassa in which to keep prisoners, almost amounts to a sufficient sum in two years to erect a suitable jail. I solicit your appropriation of moderate amounts for the erection of those two buildings and that you authorize the sale of the present public building that is used as a jail in Greenville, in case I shall find it advisable.

The subject of education should by no means escape attention, though I can profess only a cursory notice of it on this occasion. I am happy to say that there is no abatement of benevolence and zeal on the part of our foreign friends, to assist in adequately providing for our educational interest, and we should, as a people, feel very grateful, and entertain the kindest feelings towards the foreign teachers residing within this Republic, who with much sacrifice of health as well as of domestic and social enjoyments, are praise worthily laboring for the moral and intellectual improvement of our youth. It is also very gratifying, to know that some of the schools now in operation, and in contemplation, are to be conducted on the manual labor system, a system of operation that has been hitherto a great desideratum. While being so very liberally assisted by foreign benevolence, it occurs to me, that it is not only a wise policy, but the imperative duty of this government, to support at least a good common school in each of our settlements, and to compel parents and guardians to give their children and wards no less than a definite number of years' schooling.

I regret that the state of our finances does not justify at this session, the recommendation to any extent, of such measures as I deem best promotive of our agricultural interest. It is however, a very gratifying fact, that an increased interest has awakened this year in that important department: this is manifest in the increased extent, as well as systematical arrangement of a number of the farms within the state, which has been induced to a great extent, by the importation of increased facilities for cultivation and manufacturing.

I will venture however, to recommend the appropriation of two or three hundred dollars, to assist in defraying the expense of holding a national fair next December, in the government square of this city; as also to assist in awarding premiums to the best producers. I have no doubt that this measure will prove the incipient step to the formation of a state agricultural society by our enterprising citizens, having its county auxiliaries, and holding its regular annual fairs; and thus, in imitation of the enterprising citizens of other civilized nations, encouraging one another, inciting a commendable spirit of rivalry, as well as dispensing throughout the state such useful information, as will powerfully tell upon the interest of this rising Republic

In connection with this subject, I am happy to say, that some of our enterprising citizens organized themselves into a company this year, for the purpose of facilitating intercourse and transportation to and from the interior, by opening roads; which they purpose I learn, to be conducted under well digested plans and regulations. This enterprise, if judiciously and energetically prosecuted, cannot fail to rapidly promote our commercial and agricultural interest, as well as greatly conduce to the spread of civilization and christianity to the interior tribes. I am sanguine that this company, when duly recognized by you, will recieve such countenance and encouragement as a wise policy shall dictate.

The organization of some well digested and effective system, by which unobstructed intercourse to and from the wealthy sections of our interior might be secured, has hitherto been a desideratum. The principal barrier has been a want of means for opening a highway, and for the adequate compensation of discreet and enterprising agents to be located at suitable points, and to tinerate as occasion may require, for the purpose of carrying out the very humane and laudable provision contained in the 15th section of the 5th Article of the Constitution of this Republic, which recognizes, as a cherished object of this government, the improvement of the native tribes, their advancement in the arts of agriculture and husbandry; and which provides that the President shall appoint discreet persons to make periodical tours among them for the purpose of calling their attention to and instructing them in those wholesome branches of industry, as the legislature can make provision for the purpose by the appropriation of money.

Without mentioning other valuable commodities of our interior I invite your attention to one article of cotton. It is an unquestionable fact, that our interior tribes manufacture hundreds of thousands of domestic cloths annually, which must consume several millions pounds of raw cotton; thousands of these cloths through much difficulty, find their way down to the seaboard annually; but if the communication was kept open, and they could be assured of a ready sale, and were encouraged by discreet and judicious agents to increase the cultivation of the cotton plant, in a very few years, millions of pounds will be brought down annually and exported, as also would other valuable commodities [illegible] down. Gentlemen, you will pardon me, for being so unguarded as to express myself so strongly on this subject, when I inform you, that I can well remember when my thoughts on the cultivation of cotton were to be confined entirely on the entire line of coast (100 miles between Sooher and Cape Palmas; but by encouragement it has long since been seduced to a limited extension of a mile or two; equally as [illegible] has the ground-nut (ground pea) been encouraged, within a few years, to spread and is we know, that the natives of the interior are more industrious, ingenious, intelligent and free to barter than those around them. This is a subject that cannot be dismissed without the remark, that if the merchant of facts I have attempted, will induce such enquiry and investigation on the part of the statesman and philanthropist; as will not only lead to the discovery of facts far more interesting than those I have stated, but to such a practical manifestation of that interest as will, through the instrumentality of this government, promptly subserve the cause of commerce, civilization and christianity on this continent.

Gentlemen, I have next to perform the very painful duty of announcing to you, that Liberia and State have sustained almost irreparable loss in the decease of several distinguished citizens since your last session. Hon. George R. Ellis, Senator for this county; the Hon. Ex Secretary Charles Henry, and Col. James D. Watkins, of Grand Bassa County; and the Hon. Judge Murry of Sinoe County, have all been taken away from us within the course of the last three months. No eulogy from me is necessary to elevate your estimate of their character and worth: the loss of them is regarded by all who were acquainted with them, as a great and common calamity, and their praise will stand forth in living characters upon the pages of our national history.

Gentlemen, need I remind you, how very important it is, that we properly heed these melancholy admonitions. Need I remind you, that we are thereby admonished to use all diligence in the conscientious discharge of all our public and private duties of this short life, preparatory to a life of blissful immortality hereafter? Let us then, so recieve and regard these melancholy dispensations, as that we may—as was intended—be greatly profited thereby, individually as well as nationally.

Gentlemen, I beg to bring my communication to a close, after I shall have stated that the past year was of necessity a year of unprecedented expense to this government; and which has been keenly felt in the pecuniary pressure that obtained throughout the state. Had it not been for the expenditure of government for the formation of a settlement at Grand Cape Mount, and two or three other expenditures not properly belonging to the current expenses, the expense of the Sinoe War could have been met without embarrassment; but having all these expenses to meet, in addition to the current expenses, without the aid of a dollar from abroad in our great emergency, it is but reasonable to suppose, that under such circumstances, government would have been embarrassed in its operations. I am happy however, to be able to inform you, that the hasty apprehensions of some, as to the inextraceability of this government from its present liabilities, shorter than three or four years, are unfounded in fact: of which you will be satisfied by the very concise statement I now proceed to give, of the receipts and disbursements of government for the fiscal year ending 30th September 1856. The Secretary of the Treasury will at an early day of your session, submit for your inspection and further information, full and detailed accounts of the same, which will also be published in a suitable, condensed form.

Receipts	$12,614, 41.
Disbursements,	" 59,319, 76.
Excess of Disbursements,	16, 705, 32

It is proper that I should state for your information that the sum of $14, 000, for the rent and purchase of a President's Mansion, is included in the above disbursements; which, if subtracted—it being payable in annual instalments of $1000—would leave an excess of about $3000, above the receipts. As before stated, this amount of $14, 000, was, during the year, reduced to $9000, which we hope to be able to cancel this year, so as to avoid nine year's interest.

It is also very gratifying to me to be able to communicate, to you, that the revenue of the last fiscal year has advanced twenty five per cent on that of the preceeding; thus evidently showing an encouraging increase of our commerce amidst the troublesome and pressing times of the year, and which is but another indication of the special interposition of Divine Providence in our emergencies.

Though we have reason to believe that our commerce and revenue will continue to increase gradually, yet gentlemen, as there is so much that can be profitably done by government if not the possession of the requisite means, and as the Executive is usually charged by your Honorable department with the annual prosecution of so many responsible important, and expensive duties, the prompt execution of which is expected by the public, from the fact that appropriations are made to meet these expenses, yet as there are seldom adequate ways and means devised to raise the amount of these annual appropriations, I beg particularly to invite your attention to this subject at this session, so that in the future, the ways and means devised for raising the annual revenue, will harmonize with the annual appropriations.

Indulging the hope as I do, that the public finances will be in a more healthy condition during the present fiscal year than they were the last, and as a consequence, there will be a diminution of my cares and anxieties. I will no doubt have more time, and be better prepared to give the subject of Ways and Means, as also kindred subjects, more thought; which with the aid of increased experience, may enable me at a future period, to render you efficient aid in the performance of this important part of your work.

Will you now permit me gentlemen, to assure you, that you shall have my cordial co-operation for the dispatch of the very important business of the session; and I sincerely hope that you will be so endowed with wisdom, and every other divine qualification, as that your session will prove harmonious and profitable; a session that will be highly creditable to yourselves, and productive of revenue constitutional; and thus reflect great honor upon our country in particular, and our race in general.

Government House,
Monrovia, Dec. 3rd 1856. }

STEPHEN ALLEN BENSON.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA, WEDNESDAY, DEC, 3, 1856.

Adventures in Life.—Exploration Tour.

Our departure—arrival at the head of the Messurado river—We leaves J. J. Powel Esq: for Kakmahs—the rout—difficulties—Mr. Campion—Arrival at Kaymah's reception,—our quarters—The Candle-stick and its history.

Friday Nov 7th. At the instance of his Excellency the President, we left Monrovia in company with the Rev. John Seys, Special Agent of the American Colonization Society on a tour through the interior of Messurado County to examine the high lands, in search of a site (as was the purpose of Mr. Seys) suitable for the establishment of an interior settlement. We left Monrovia at ½ past 8 o'clock A. M., and after a row of three hours arrived at the head of the Messurado river; our boats were soon unloaded, and with our baggage we repaired to the residence of our old friend James J. Powel Esqr., who for some time has been located here for the purpose of farming and trading with the natives. As soon as our carriers had arranged matters necessary for our traveling—refreshed themselves &c., we took a hasty meal with our host and started on our journey at ½ past 12.

After four hours hard traveling we arrived at a native village called Kaymahs by a very circuitous route about 5 P. M. Our route lay through fields or prairies, intersected by swamps which impeded our progress considerably—nevertheless our carriers seemed quite agile all the while until we reached a swamp where their services were again required that seemed to withstand their boldest onergy on account of its length, and the interminable roots of large trees under water, connected with potters-clay that admitted their weight with us on their backs up to there hips!—thus they became mired, and as a matter of course we were requested to dismount just where the water was the deepest. It would have afforded our friends no little amusement could they have seen our condition on which another carrier would be called to our assistance one shaking us by the heels, and another by the head jostling with us against the trunk of a tree, and then staggering with us to another tuft; to what avail would have been all our precaution, had we been necessarily obliged to have dismounted in the water and got a good soaking that we really just then did not stand in need of, and especially an involuntary one; Mr. Seys would often exclaim you will certainly let me fall! Rope-yarn (the head Kroomany where are you? I am all wet! No daddy, we lib go. Thus up and down until we reached terra firma again. Our friend and fellow traveller Mr. Campion, being one of those individuals suited to all circumstances (as well as Mr. Seys,) thought it best when we entered the first swamp to roll up pants, shoes and socks in his hands and foot it to the best advantage. But alas! for our poor friend, when he found it necessary to make further preparation to meet the demand of the increasing depth of the water, he thought of an old constitutional disease that he feared a too great depth of water would do harm, and just here, his torch of ambition went out and at the heighth of his voice cried for help.

Tom Jenkins, our valet, remarkable for his good nature and promptness; soon after our quarters were assigned us, proceed our evenings repast—during the interim however, Mr. Seys had been compelled to retire on the account of a severe paroxism of fever.

The child of this little village numbering about a dozen heads was very kind in endeavoring to render us as comfortable as possible for the night, and adding a pythe to our victualing box by the present ation of a fowl and some rice. When Mr Seys' Mission was made known to him, he warmly assured us that the entire surrounding country would be in favor of a settlement being established among them wherever the Americans thought proper. The hour having arrived to retire-ment, for prayer, we strove to rest our wearied bodies after the best manner we could. The hut we occupied was about 10 by 10, which necessarily became the receptacle of our baggage as well as our persons. In this narrow apartment our bed chamber proved our store house, while the yard answered the purpose of our dining room and parlor. Mr Seys occupied the sleeping apartment of about 4 feet by 2½ made of round bamboos, and we occupied another of six bamboos, four feet in length and about 13 inches in width, and when jealousy made it necessary that we should change our position, we were compelled to get up and go to bed again. Our friend, Mr Campion occupied, the baggage, and our valet, with our guide Wallah, occupied the remaining little space if space at all it might be called on an old mat spread upon the ground. At one o'clock being more wearied than when we retired from the uncomfortableness of our beds, we concluded to have a light, peradventure we might see something that would be the means of breaking the painful monotony of curious workmanship or material in our apartment. The light was readily furnished, and while Jenkins was looking around for something to place the candle in, he accidentally came across a brass candle stick of excellent work which drew from us many a novel expression as regard its history—thus I once occupied a prominent position in the family circle of which I had the honor to be a member. At the festal board I not only illumined the table for the accommodation of the guest, but the rays emitted from the taper I bore, exhilirated the hearts of all present in the fructifying influence imparted by me as the centre of the union of the evening association. I gave light to the nimble footsteps of lasses while they danced to the sweet notes of music. At the bedside of the sick, my rays illumined the cheerless hearts of the sufferer and caused him to hope in a speedy recovery. After a long career of usefulness, I was transported to Liberia, and after many good offices—while seated upon the side-board, and all the family absent from the room, I was stolen and conveyed to parts unknown, among a people who knew not my uses, hid in obscurity, little prised, where I lingered out an unhappy existence until Nov. 1856, when providentially, christian travellers visited the village in which I was a prisoner, and having access to my apartment, found me at 1 o'clock A. M., in a secluded corner of a miserable thatched hut, with not a tint of my former bright hue upon me to recommend me to their sympathies farther than the necessity of my service and the novelty of my condition, and appropriated me to my proper use. I was bargained for; but through the skill of one of the travellers, my liberty was effected without price. Thus have been my history for many years—thanks to my deliverers.

Saturday 8th Thermometer 89: After breakfasting we took a drink of some very excellent palm wine, and persuaded our friend Mr. Seys to follow our example in consequence of the anti-febrile character of the article, to which he readily consented and as a matter of course he soon had a pretty good draught which acted like a charm. Our very excellent companion Mr. Campion, who knowing so well the uses of this excellent beverage of olden reputation, needed no farther recommendation than—will you have a drink also Mr. Campion? A nod of the head being a significant assent. In travelling in Africa, one can hardly imagine how resuscitating a good drink of this beverage is to the poor wearied traveller. We did shed the Chief of this little village for his hospitality to, us, obtained another price, and left Kaymah's, the reminiscense of which, we will long remember. An hours walk from this place brought us to one of the plantations of Norvleh (Great Devil) and old king of good reputation among his subjects. The many unwilling summersets that some of our friends had to make; and the very strange mode of crossing streams on a log—need but be spoken of to remind them of their imitation of horse back-riders, though they really manifested in this particular but little skul of horsemanship. The old town, the seat of Majesty has within late become depopulated in consequence of his death. We left Norvleh's after our carriers came up, and after a walk of an hour and a half, reached a town called Zeor (Circle). This village was the neatest that we had seen, numbering many more houses. Here after resting 10 or 15 minutes [which indeed is quite essential on account of the ruggedness of the road when travelling through a wild unbroken country, where every obstacle however trifling is permitted to intercept the travelers progress,] we hastened on and at ½ past 12. M arrived at Kydeerles [Jack Careys;] Immediately after Mr. Seys had announced himself, Jack recognized Him, and their salutation were really affecting. The reminiscences of past years of arduous Missionary labor were brought to mind, and here stood one who first received the Reverend Rev. H. Mumford in his own and fostered his efforts as far as ability would allow. He said was a woman who had been many years ago baptized and named Mary C. R. Seys by the Rev Mr. Seys at Robertsville. On being questioned about her christian progress, she frankly acknowledged her lack of fervency, and said that when she saw the man of God who many years ago led her to Christ, her heart burned with great fervency. Jack importunites for our spending the night with him after a pretty tiresome walk of twelve miles from Kaymah's were unceasing; but wishing to reach Tom Peters [Gay Zeorh's] that evening, we partook lightly of the meal that Jack kindly had prepared for us—the present, and after prayer took our departure. There are incidents which tell in favor of christianity even in a dark country. We arrived at Tom Peter's at 5 P. M. Tom being absent, his lady received us, and assigned us appartments for our carriers and ourselves. This town is about twenty miles from Kaymah's and 10 from Jack Careys. During our day's travel after leaving Jack's, Mr. Seys had a pretty severe attack of fever, pulse being 120, which would in the possession of some excellent palm wine, we think we would have been able to destroy every symptom of fever in a short time—and necessarily, we recommended him to bathe his arms face and head—frequently in the little streams that lie all along our path way, which operation tended much to his relief.

The Legislature. This body met according to law on the first Monday of this present inst. Hon. Edward J. Roye, who had been elected to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. C. B. Ellis, Hon. John Hanson, who filled the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the late Hon. C. Henry, Senators, and Hon John D. Johnson, who filled the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon J. M. Moore, Representative, were sworn into office in convention of the Senate and House of Representatives, on the 2nd. The Convention adjourned. Rules for the government of both Houses having been adopted by the separate bodies, a Committee was appointed to wait on his Excellency the President, and inform him that the Legislature was prepared to receive any communication which he might be pleased to make. The legislature being informed that the President would meet them on Wednesday, the third, at 11 o'clock, the M. E. Church was procured by a special committee appointed for that purpose being more commodious than the Senate Chamber for the accommodation of the large concourse of citizens, who were in attendance to hear his Excellency's message to the Legislature.

The President's Message takes up eight columns of our little sheet, which deprives us of the privilege of noticing it particularly, and making such comments upon it, as it justly deserves. Nevertheless its systematic arrangement, clearness of diction—application of parts to appropriate ends as recommended—the general knowledge of the wants of the Country, the character of the people—the advisory parts to the Legislature—the subjects recomended for their legislation, will speak in volumes of his character and worth to Liberia, for ages to come;—though elaborate, and entirely comprehensive in the whole, we thought that upon some points, there were a little too much brevity.

The James Town. The U. S Ship James Town bearing the pennant of Commodore Crabbe, arrived in our harbor on the 28 ult. On the morning of the 29th national salutes were exchanged, and on the first inst., the Commodore with a number of his officers, visited the city, and were introduced to his Excellency the President by Dr J. Z. Forney, U. S. Com Agent. The interview we learn was very flattering and the Commodore was much pleased with his visit. The Commodore as well as officers, appeared to be in good health, and we believe this to be the case of the ship's crew generally.

Monrovia Dec. 2nd. 1856

To the Christians of the several denominations composing the Religious Society of this Republic.

Dear Brethren.—Feeling it to be a duty incumbent upon myself as much as any other minister of the gospel of Christ to aid in the promotion of order and peace within the limits of this Republic by every christian means which will savor of good unto the people under the blessing of God:—I have concluded to beseech prayerfully, all christian pastors, as well as the members of their charge, to use all possible peaceful means to influence the masses to give their aid to have the term of the office of the Presidency changed from two to four years at this present session of the Legislature.

In time past, you have seen how the churches of God have been afflicted by political feuds becoming interwoven in the movements of the church; which injured the progress of our holy Zion, and cast a deep and portentous cloud over our Religious progress. In view of this great evil, which every lover of peace, and order and quietude of our several communities have at heart, I beseech the brethren, to use their influence if it seemeth good unto them—to that end—that thereby, the peace and well-being of the people may be promoted, and the evil of our sorrows removed as far from us as circumstances will possibly admit. There are many of our intelligent and peaceful citizens, with whom I have conversed, who would willingly agree with you in your reasons of the unfitness of the measure, having already been well advised of the evil consequences of the too frequent occurrence of the presidential election. To prosper as a Christian nation, we should endeavor strictly to harmonize every principle of governmental policy to the well being of the people.

I remain sir
Yours truly,
H. UNDERWOOD.

Greenville Nov. 20th 1856.

At a meeting of the members of the Greenville Musical Association present G. Lloyd President, and H. W. Monger acted Secretary.

The death of Hon. R. E. Murray Conductor of the Greenville Musical Association, being announced, the following preamble, and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

In common with our fellow Citizens, we lament the death of our fellow townsman, the Hon. R. E. Murry.

We have long revered him as the ripe scholar, the eminent jurist, and have felt a just pride in his well earned reputation, but his relations towards our institution, were such, as to endear him to us, for the warm interest he has ever exibited in its prosperity.

Be it therefore

Resolved, That we greatly deplore, the loss of our lamented conductor, who as a minister, and civil officer in the discharge of those duties incumbent upon him, had no superior.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the bereaved family of our deceased friend

Resolved, That the members of this Association, wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be published in the Liberia Herald, and that one be furnished to the family of the deceased.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills the best Remedies for the Cure of Female Complaints.—The extraordinary effect these Pills have upon all complaints peculiarly incidental to females, would appear incredible, if it were not confirmed daily by the wonderful cures they effect in India. It is an unquestionable fact, that there is not any remedy to equal them throughout the World, for exterminating suffering from the softer sex, than these admirable Pills, particularly for young girls entering into womanhood, therefore all are requested to give them a trial, which will insure their recommendation.

RUSSIAN DECLARATION OF POLICY.

"The treaty signed at Paris on the 30th March, in putting an end to a struggle the proportions of which threatened to extend still further, and the final issue of which was beyond human calculations, has re-established international relations in Europe. The Powers who had coalesced against us had taken as their motto, respect for the right and independence of governments. We do not pretend to enter into an historical examination of this question, nor is it our intention to raise a sterile discussion, but merely to arrive at the practical application of the same principles which the great Powers of Europe themselves proclaimed. We do not do any of those Powers the injustice to suppose, now that the struggle is over, that each one considers itself authorised to follow a line of conduct suited to its own peculiar interests. On the contrary, we feel convinced that all the Powers have the sincere intentions to act according to the principles they at first professed. Taking this for granted, we must suppose that it is the intention of all the Powers who took part in the late war, as it is that of the Emperor, our august master, to make the general peace the starting point for the re-establishment of relations based on a respect for the right and independence of governments. Has this hope been realised? Are the international relations re-established? Without entering into a detail of some secondary questions, we are compelled to state, with regret, that there are two countries forming part of the European family, where in one the regular state of things does not yet exist, and in the other it is threatened to be compromised. We allude to Greece and to the kingdom of Naples. The occupation of the Hellenic territory by a foreign force, against the will of the Sovereign and the feelings of the nation, is now without any just reason. Political motives might, to a certain point, explain the violence done to the Sovereign of the country, and necessities of war might be alleged as a reason for such a course, but now, when neither of these causes any longer exist, it appears to us impossible to justify at the tribunal of equity the continued presence of a foreign force on the soil of Greece. Thus, the first words pronounced by our august master when the re-establishment of peace had enabled the Emperor to raise his voice were clear and precise. We have never disembled our opinion in the councils of the Cabinets, and we shall continue that course. We consider it our duty, however, to add that, although the results have not fully answered our expectations, we retain a hope that we shall not remain isolated on a ground where right and justice are evident ly in favour of the cause which we support. As to the kingdom of Naples, if the question is not to find a remedy, it appears to us that it is time to seek a means of preventation. The king of Naples is the object of a pressure, not because his Majesty may have transgressed any one of the engagements imposed on him by treaties with foreign Courts, but because, in the exercise of his incontestable rights of sovereignty, he governs his subjects as he thinks proper. We can understand that, in consequence of a friendly predisposition, one government might offer to another advice inspired by kind interest, and that this advice might even assume the character of exortation, but we think that that is the extreme limit at which it ought to stop. Less than ever it is now permitted in Europe to forget that Sovereigns are equals among themselves; and that it is not extent of territory, but the sanctity of the rights of each, which regulates the relations which exist between them. To wish to obtain from the King of Naples concessions as to the internal regime of his States by threatening demonstrations is to wish to govern in his place, and to proclaim the right of the strong over the weak. It is needless for us to point out to you the opinion expressed by our august master on such pretensions. His Majesty entertains a hope that they will not be in practice; and he is the more strongly imbued with this hope, as it is also the doctrine which the States, where the principles of political liberty are the more fully developed, have always advanced. It is, in fact, their profession of faith. You will be careful, whenever the two questions above alluded to are started at the place of your residence, to allow of no doubt being entertained as to the opinion of our august master on the subject. This frankness naturally proceeds from the system which the Emperor has adopted from the moment he ascended the throne, and this system is not unknown to you. The Emperr wishes to live in good harmony with all governments, and his Majesty thinks that the best means of attaining that object is not to conceal his ideas on any question connected with public European right. The faisceau of those who, for long years, have supported with us the principles to which Europe owes more than a quarter of a century of peace no longer exists in its ancient integrity. The will of our august master is foreign to this result. Circumstances have restored to us our full liberty of action. The Emperor has decided to devote by preference all his solicitude to the welfare of his subjects, and to concentrate on the development of the internal resources of the country and activity which will not be diverted by things abroad, unless when the positive interests of Russia shall absolutely demand it. Russia is reproached with isolating herself, and keeping silent in presence of facts wich do not accord with either law or equity, and it is said that Russia sulks. Russia does not sulk—she meditates. As to the silence of which we are accused, we may call to mind that a short time ago an artificial agitation was organized against us, because our voice was heard whenever we thought it necessary to support right. This action, tutelary for many Governments and from which Russia herself derives no benefit, has been laid hold of to accuse us of tending to I know not what universal domination. We can shelter our silence under the impression of this souvenir. We do not, howevr, think that such is the attitude which belongs to a Power to which Providence has assigned the position which Russia occupies in Europe. This despatch proves to you that our august master does not confine himself to this character when he thinks it his duty to make known his opinion. It will be the same whenever the voice or Russia may be useful to the cause of right, of when it will not be for the dignity of the Emperor to let the world remain in ignorance of his views and opinions. As to the employment of our material forces, the Emperor reserves to himself his free judgement. The policy of our august master is a national one; it is not egotistical; and if his Majesty makes the interest of his people paramount, he does not admit that the advancement of those interests can excuse the violation of the rights of others.—You are authorized,&c., GORTSCHAKOFF."—The Examiner

THE MIRACULOUS REMEDY!!!

TEN YEARS INTERMITTENT ATTACKS OF ERYSIPELAS! EFFECTUALLY CURED.

Copy of a Letter from Mrs. H. Trimmer, of Compton near Winchester, dated 13th Sep. 1853.

To Pressor Holloway.

Sir,—I suffered for a period of ten years, (until the last months,) with the most dreadful intermittent attacks of Erysipelas, which confined me to my bed during the whole of the summer months in each year, I consulted the most eminent medical gentlemen in Winchester, but was from time to time doomed to be disappointed in my hopes of obtaining my relief to my sufferings, although I complied strictly with the directions my advisers gave me. At leng I was persuaded to give your Ointment and Pills a tial by a female riend who had been cured of a bad leg by using them fo my surprise and delight, a change for the better was quickly produced, and in a very short time, they caused the Erysipelas totally to appear, and my health was entirely resuscitated which has remained good ever since.

I remain, gratefully yours,
(Signed) HARRIET TRIMNER.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF SCROFULA.

WILLIAM PROCUS, of Emyvale, (a young man well known in that neighbourhood,) was afflicted for three years with Scrofula on the left arm there were four ulcers which discharged continuously, and reduced the poor fellow to a mere skeleton. He was for along time under the care of one medical gentleman, and consulted many others, but derived no benefit whatever. At last he had recourse to Holloway's Ointment and Pills, and by persevering with these remedies, in the course of eight weeks, his arm was completely well, and his health thoroughly re-established.

The truth of this statement can be verified by many of the inhabitants of Emyvale, and particularly by Mr. PATRICK MC KENNA, Druggist, of that place.

The Pills should be used conjointly with the Ointment in most of the following cases;—

Bad Legs	Chiego-foot	Fistulas	Sore-throats
Bad Breasts	Chilblains	Gout	Skin diseases
Burns	Chapped hands		Glandular
Bunions	Corn [Sof.]	Lumbago	Swelling
Bites of	Cancers	Piles	Sore-head
Mosquitoes	Contracted	Rheumatism	Scurvy
and Sand-	nd Stiff Joints	Scalds	Ulcers
Flies	Co-coobay	Tumours	Wounds
Sore Nipples	Yaws	Elephantiasis

ASTONISHING CURE OF DROPSY.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. David Simpson, of Collingham, dated 4th September, 1854.

To Professor Holloway.

Sir,—It is with great pleasure I have to inform you of a most wonderful cure of that dreadful malady, the Dropsy, effected on my daughter by the use of your invaluable Pills. She had been under medical treatment for a long time without deriving any benefit, although she was tapped twice, and fourteen pounds o water taken from her each time. After suffering very severely for some time, she finally had recourse to your Pills, and in four weeks was completely cured, after every other remedy failed to do her the slightest good. I therefore feel bound to make this statement public for the benefit of similar sufferers.

I remain, Sir, yours obediently.

(Signed) DAVID SIMPSON.

WONDERFUL CURE OF ASTHMA.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. Joseph Wild, of Hyde, Cheshire, dated the 5th of August, 1854.

To Professor Holloway,

DEAR SIR,—Mrs. NEWTON, (a lady well known in this town, residing in Hanover Street,) was afflicted for years with a severe attack of Asthma; difficulty of breathing, and a most violent cough, causing severe pains in her side, particularly whenever she took cold; she tried many remedies, and consulted different individuals, without deriving any benefit. At last she came to me, and I advised her to take your Pills and use your Ointment,—after a few weeks, by perseverance with your remedies, she was considerably better, and by continuing the same, in three months she was perfectly cured.

I remain, Dear Sir, yours faithfully.

(Signed) JOSEPH WILD.

These celebrated Pills are wonderfully efficacious in the following complaints:—

Dropsy	Indigestion	Jaundice	Inflammation
Colics	Dysentery	Asthma	Tumours
Gout	Erysipelas	Debility	Sore Throats
Lumbago	Rheumatism	Fevers of all kinds	Head-ache
Piles	Consumption	Liver Complaints

LIBERIA HERALD.

A VOICE FROM JAMAICA.

For the enlightenment of our readers and the public generally, we clip the following interesting and well-timed article from the Anti-Slavery Reporter for October, 1856. Another healthful object we have in view in giving it a place in the Era, is to endeavour thereby to work such a chastening effect upon our pious, Christian and Missionary Contemporary, the African, as to imbue him with a sense of repentant shame, for his incessant efforts in making light of the burdens of the inhabitants of the Colony, thro' a sheer love of mischievous controversy and currying favor with the Government, opposing all we can do to effect some improvement in the Administration of Justice.

The hardships of Colonists are grievous overmuch even under worldly rulers and their minions; but they reach a magnitude that is positively startling, when pious folks become the hardhearted opponents of Administrative Reform, and propagandists of political intolerance. It is not our intention, however, to excite despair in our readers minds by the above apparently lugubrious reflections. Quite the contrary. We were never more hopeful and cheerful. We have passed the tempestuos Rubicon, and are on firm land!—A few more loyal efforts, fellow Colonists, and the tax-payers shall have voice in the Government that imposes the taxes upon them.

If our contemporary has not exhausted his vocabulary of hard terms upon us both before and since he put on THE Government harness (in which we can assure him he will in the end be put to paces far more physically exhausting, and soiling to his gown and surplice than his duties proper of the pulpit), we should like to see what model specimens he has in reserve for the delinquent essayist of Jamaica? Now, by parity of reasoning, if we of the Era, by our advocacy of popular institutions in Sierra Leone (where the Colonists possess no vestige of a voice in the Government that taxes them for its support) are adjudged by our contemporary to be banished the Colony—surely the punishment he would mete to him of Jamaica would be Lynch or Cooper Law. As some of our readers may not know what these laws purport, we will explain that the first is a summary trial by brute force with the addendum of hanging on the first tree: the next partakes all the modes of the first, excepting that it hangs a man first, and tries him afterwards. Of the latter type we have had a specimen (only in another way), in Sierra Leone.

But our friend, the African, has furthermore to provide the fate of no less a personage than the Editor of the Anti Slavery Reporter! What's to be done with him for endorsing and republishing treasonable matter "calculted to create "dissatisfaction and disorded" in Jamaica"—"making the people believe they are "ruled by "a tyrant."—Seeking "to make the administra-"tions of Metcalf and Barclay unpopular." &c.—Now, from the despotic principles often manifested by our contemporary, he would doubtless decree greater punishment to offenders against high rank and great Colonies than lower rank and petty Colonies. But in an onslaught upon him of the Reporter, he of the African must reckon upon the probability of some opposition: the Parent Church Missionary Society and its lay supporters who expend large sums annually upon their pious retainers here, might read them the very necessary lesson: "These are not the "days of "Daniel De Foe, when men were pil-"loried for their "political principles—"we em-"plov and pay you for "evangelical—not politi-"cal purposes:" "the betraying "and selling the "liberties of the inhabitants of Sierra "Leone "was no part of our directions to, nor of our "agreement with you."

But we beg pardon of our readers for delaying them from the perusal of the article itself, by the length of remarks we could not forego the seasonoble opporthnity of making, and ask their particular attention to the parts we have italicised.

We have recived the following (says the Anti-Slavely Reporter) per last mail:—

"Jamaica, August 25.

"We are now ruled by a lieutenant-governor, the commander of the forces, Major-General Bell, in whom appear to be untied the promptitude of the soldier with the frankness of a straightforward honest man and the all pervading manners of a well bred old English gentleman. No opportunity has occurred to enable him to exhibit the patriarchal principles which they say he would embrace his government with; and his post is but temporary, perhaps Jamaica may never witness the exercise of that fatherly protection of one and all of her inhabitants, which it has been her misfortunes for years to have been deprived of. We do not know who is to be our new governor; indeed, people are become apathetic as to the person, being fully satisfied, that whatever the merits or demerits of the individual may be, so long as the Colonial Secretary founds his opinion of a governor's fitness on his own ex parte statements in his despatches, it is wholly immaterial who he is. The colonial policy of the Home Government seems to be regulated wholly by success; but it will soon be made apparent that success is not prosperity, and that it is an ingrediens that enters largely into colonial systems, and it easily purchased. This island alone will afford lamentable evidence, in a few years, of the truth of the proposition. Sir Henry Barkly, it is true, suceeded in doing many things here, and his measures, when examined by red-tape officialism, obtained for him the laudation of a Colonial Secretary; but how, and in what way, were those measures concocted, agitated, supported and obtained? and what fruition has the whole framework of society had? A few short months will shew that his great economic reforms have but paved the way to an extravagance of an extraordinary character, and the Colonial Office will, when too late, perceive that his government was as great a failure as that of the late Sir Charles Metcalfe's.

"The country labours not only under pecuniary but social and moral evils: their removal will not be achieved by a governor who is sent, either because he wants an office, or because the Colonial Secretary is desirous of appeasing the clamour of the West India Board. No; we want a governor whose aim is higher; who, being above the influence of pelf or party, is able to be self dependent, who can undertake the duties as a labour of love, and shed around him that benevolence which sparkles with so much lustre in the character of a man like Lord Shaftesbury, we want a man who will be the friend of all, and not of a section; who will regard the negro as a man and a brother, and who, by his example, will give practical proof of the sincerity of his intentions. With such a governor—with Shaftesbury—Jamaica would in a few years be the brightest gem in the crown of England. Her people are excellent, but they need encouragement and a healthy example; her dusky and ebon sons pant for knowledge, but there is none to impart it: they try to develope the riches of their fertile land, but their pigmy efforts meet no help: how then, can they succeed? Man continues not to toil on the rough ascent of life unless he receives the encouraging smile and onward help of friends. But read the catalogue of articles exhibited a few weeks back at Lucca, in Hanover, most of them designed, composed, produced, or manufactured by the children of Africa, and without or with imperfect, teaching. What would not the friends of freedom witness in this downtrod den race, had it the benefit of European teaching, and sound English moral example! Here we must pray for assistance from home; our help can only come from the mother country. If you would urge on the Colonial Secretary that we are British subjects—a part of the same great empire—the children of the parent State; that we require the assistance of our parent. We do not want protection, we want help. Give us schools, moral teachers, give us an industrious moral population, who can improve our own by their example. Instead of helping to banish Englishmen to America, to enrisch that country by their labour, let the tide of immigration flow to no Jamaica. We have lands in abundance, and all within the grasp of the Crown. In the fertile and salubrious district of Portland, which possesses the climates of Southern Europe and Bermuda, thousands of acres have become vested in the Crown by reason of the condition of the original grants being unperformed, and [illegible] the industrious of England find a home, and be welcomed by their sable brethren.

I have spun this to rather a greater length than intended, and while closing, I cannot forbear to notice to you the generous act of the peasantry on a sugar estate in St. Thomas in the East. A fire occurred there, and did much damage: the people not only assisted in putting it out, but gratuitously gave their services subsequently to assist in repairing the injury. What a contrast this is to the planters' avarice! When the price of sugar fell to 15*l.* per ton, the planters appealed to the peasantry to reduce the rate of wages. They willingly responded; but now that sugar is at 30*l* and more per ton, the planters pay the low-price labour rate, and I have not heard of a single attempt to make a mutuality of interest between the planter and his labourer. This is muzzling the ox that treadeth out the corn" The Sierra Leone "Era"

LAWS ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE DURING ITS PRESENT SESSION AND PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY.

AN ACT CHARTERING THE CITY OF GREENVILLE.

Whereas the citizens of Greenville, county of Sinoe, have petitioned the Legislature to constitute them a "Body Politic" and corporate, by ratifying and granting a charter by them drawn up, and herewith presented; therefore,

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled,—

Sec. 1. That the inhabitants of the city of Greenville be and they are hereby constituted a "Body Politic" and corporate, under the name and style of Mayor Aldermen, common Councilmen, and Freemen of Greenville; and by such name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, and do all other acts that are usually done by such corporate bodies.

Sec. 2. The Common Council shall consist of nine members, residents of the city of Greenville, of whom one shall be chairman.

Sec. 3. The city of Greenville shall have jurisdiction within the corporate bounds of the said city; the corporate bounds shall be as follows: commencing at low water-mark of the south easterly angle of lot 393, and running North forty degrees East. 24 chains, more or less; along the margin of Sinoe River to the mouth of a small creek; then North twenty degrees West, 30 chains, more or less, to the dividing line of the farm lands of Edward Morris and James Jesse Jeffs; then North forty degrees East to Sinoe River, to low water mark, say 16 chains, then North twenty degrees East to a creek, say 46 chains, more or less; then North seventy degrees West, to low water-mark in the Po River, say 85 chains, more or less; thence along the Atlantic Ocean at low water mark to the starting point at lot number three hundred and ninety eight, containing an area of from four to five hundred acres of land. And in case it should be necessary to execute lawful process without the bounds of said corporation, then and in that case any magistrate residing within said county may issue judicial process, on representation of any city officer being made to him; and the same may be executed by any constable of the county.

Sec. 4. The corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority to make and fulfill contracts, take and hold real estate to the value of one hundred thousand dollars, and lay all such taxes as may be necessary for city purposes; shall pass all necessary municipal laws and ordinances: said "Body Politic" shall have full power to settle its own rules of proceedings: to appoint its own officers; regulate its own fees, and all other necessary acts not incompatible with the general laws of this Republic.

Sec. 5. All ordinances and municipal laws established by the Common Council shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of the Mayor; if disapproved, his objections shall be made to the Common Council within three days; and if not returned within three days, such delay shall be equal to approval; provided, however, such delay be not occasioned by the adjournment of the Common Council: the Common Council may, nevertheless, by a vote of two thirds of its members, pass any law independent of his approval.

Sec. 6. The first election of City officers shall take place on the third Monday in February 1857; all other election shall take place on the third Monday in February in each following year, and shall be conducted according to the laws governing elections for state officers, under such modifications and restrictions as the Common Council may ordain. The elective officers shall be one Mayor, four Aldermen, and nine Common Councilmen, all of whom shall hold their office for the term of one year, unless vacated by resignation, removal, or death: in which cases vacancies may be supplied by special election. No person shall be eligible to the office of Mayor, who is not a resident of the city of Greenville, and who does not own real estate to the value of one hundred dollars. No one shall be a Common Councilman who is not a resident of said city, and who does not possess unincumbered real estate to the value of fifty dollars; and no person who does not possess real estate in the city of Greenville shall be allowed to vote.

Sec. 7. There shall be a City Court, which shall be composed of three Aldermen, one of whom shall be chairman, whose duty shall be to try and determine all cases coming into the same, except such as may be taken therefrom by appeals, as is hereinafter provided. The Aldermen shall, within the precincts of the city, exercise the functions of justice of the peace, in such infractions of their laws or ordinances as may be assigned them; and it shall be their duty to try and determine all petty offences; but appeal may be had from their decision to the City Court. The said City Court shall, by its own clerk, keep detailed records of all matters and things which shall come before it, in a book or books provided for that purpose, which when full shall be forwarded to the Secretary of State, for preservation among the archives of this Republic.

Sec. 8. The Common Council shall hold its first Session on the first Monday in March. All impeachments, made by the aforesaid Common Council, of officers shall be made to the Mayor, who may, if said impeachments be sufficiently estabtished, suspend such officer or officers, until the next ensuing session of the City Court, which shall try all such impeachments.

Sec. 9. The Mayor, Aldermen and Common Councilmen shall have power to lay out new streets, highways and public walks or parks, and keep them in order, and shall have power to appoint inspectors of all kinds of produce brought into the city, or exported from the city; they shall also appoint inspectors of weights and measures.

Sec. 10. The Mayor of said city shall be chief executive, and it shall be his duty to be vigilant and active in causing the laws thereof to be executed and enforced, and he shall be conservator of the peace within the city: he shall recommend to the City Council at its regular session all such measures as in his opinion would enhance the condition of the streets, avenues, highways and public walks of the same, as well as to point out all nuisances, of whatever kind, and recommend measures for their removal.

Sec. 11. The Common Council shall have power to issue all wholesail and retail Licenses; fix and enjoy the benefit of the same for city purposes; they shall have power to draw out of the public treasury, by order of the President of the Republic, all moneys which are now due the Town of Greenville, agreeable to an act granting certain moneys to the different Towns and Villages; and the President is hereby requested to order the payment of the aforesaid amount to the Common Councilmen of the city of Greenville.

Sec. 12. This charter may be altered, revoked, or amended, on presentation properly made by said City authority, by petition to the Legislature of the Reuplic of Liberia, or without such petition.

Sec. 13. This charter and all its provisions shall go into effect on the first Monday in January 1857; any law or charter to the contrary be, and the same is hereby repealed.

A RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING THE PRESIDENT TO FURNISH THE AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETIES PREMIUM LANDS FOR EMIGRANTS.

Whereas application has been made to this government by the Indiana State Colonization Society to negotiate for the purchase of large tracts of lands, for the purpose of distributing the same as bounty lands to persons emigrating from that state to Liberia, as an additional premium to the grants of land already allowed by this government to emigrants coming to this country; and as this government is solicitous to encourage the emigration of enterprising men of color to this country, by the employment of all proper means;—Therefore

It is Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled.

Sec. 1. That from and after the passage of this Resolution, the President shall have authority to negotiate, with any of the Colonization Societies desiring it, to furnish them, at a stipulated price, not exceeding five dollars, nor less than one dollar per acre—marshy lands excepted—with any quantity of farm lands, which they may require for the use of emigrants, as an inducement for them to emigrate.

Sec. 2. Certificates shall be granted to the Society or Societies purchasing lands according to the provision of this Resolution,—acknowledging the receipt of the purchase money, for which credit has been granted on the book of the Treasury department, for the quantity of land purchased, which lands are to be deeded to emigrants on presentation of certificates signed by the proper officers of the Society making the purchase.

SEC. 3. And further, the President shall exercise his discretion whether the lands disposed of, agreeable to the regulations herein provided, shall be particularly designated, or whether the quantity purchased be merely stated, to be decided by the choice of the emigrants out of any unappropriated public lands. It being provided, nevertheless, that no land shall be so certified or conveyed away under these provisions, as to give any Colonization Society the exclusive right or privilege of settling any Town or village, by having possession of all the farm lands of any village or adjacent to any Town.

ADVENTURES IN LIFE—EXPLORATION TOUR.

Exploration of a more northerly range of hills—Campion's fall—Tom's loquacity—The oriferousness of the soil and Mineral specimens—The range of hills, formation, and growth—Return to Toms—Zodahs Messengers—Departure from Tom's dashes—Chair making Farther exploration—Departure for Millsburg.

Tuesday 11th. Thermometer 75½. Zoblch from Monrovia about 50 Miles, direction E. N. E. Having breakfasted we started another route N. E. to explore a more northerly range of hills. In leaving Tom's town we had an uncommonly illy made bridge to cross, and strangers not accustomed to African traveling, would have accomplished a great feat in crossing one of these rotten pole bridges without assistance. Mr. Campion, unfortunately having survived all the difficulties and dangers of crossing, met with an accidental slip a the end of the bridge which brought that poor lumpt of flesh prostrate to the ground—we sympathized, but had to laugh. An half hours travel brought us to Tom's plantation, where we found three very interesting children, his daughters and son.—Tom ere this, had become a new and an unprofitable companion in consequence of the quantity of palm wine he had drank, which caused him to be very loquacious. We begged for a respite from his continued volubility for reflection, that we might be able to give more attention to things around us, as the soil here presented a different feature to any other we had seen in the route; but, our entreaties were of no avail. Every sword that passed between the Special Agent and ourselves, that he had the least idea of the squad, however foreign we were certain to be interrupted. "This is fine Cape," "fine pass Zoblch Cape" "I tink dat town better he dis side" "No swamp here," "dis ground run long way for catch dem big Cape," "Two fine country dis Mis Sey, Let we go look further" "My heart member you go like dis time." "Fine water lub here for drink" "Bamboo no long too much" "my boy fit cut bamboo for bring him dis place. Mr Seys would often remark Tom we thank you, we see this is fine country; but I have a little fever, and you talk too much, I want to think a little.

The soil here is oriferous, and Micre, felspar, and quartz seem to be abundant. The situation of these range of hills from Monrovia is N. N. E. forming a near as we can calculate the latter Y distance about 50 miles. The growth here could not materially differ from the first range of hills which we explored on Monday, and we are of the opinon that the latter formed a part of the former range presenting different angles. The growth therefore were as abundant and majestic as the former. Strange to say, that in the route of an 100 and more miles, we never saw nor heard a monkey, one of the most novel incidents of travel in this part of Africa. Having explored this range, we returned to Tom's town quite wearried indeed, this day we made a tour of twelve or more miles. Our good Jenkins had prepared our dinner which we relished with the appetites of men. After dinner we arranged for our departure for Zodah Quashi's who had sent eight carries for Mr. Seys on Monday, and they were still waiting on us.

Wednesday 12th Thermometer 76. After dashes were given to Toms several brothers &c, we left ¼ to 9, A. M., passed several villages and reached Zodah's at ½ past 2 P. M.—distance from Toms 15 miles; direction N. Zodahs from Millsburg S. Toms from Zodahs E. In traveling to Zodah's we had several streams to cross, and we feel that our friend Mr Seys will not forget when he found it necessary to change carries with dispatch. How our friend Campion made out at this eventful pot, we never interested ourselves much to know, but mounted a stalwart youth and sped our way with all the chilvary of a Knight. Zodah was pleased to see Mr Seys, and manifested great concern for his welfare.

Thursday 13 Thermometer 71. We scarcely ever saw a morning more bright and clear than this. The sun rose in majestic beauty and grandure—the morning fair and the breeze cool and delightful. The exhilirating temperature of the atmosphere was the remark even of the natives. It was our purpose to have continued our exploration after breakfast to another range of hills, but in this we were disappointed (but agreeably nevertheles) as Zoda concluded that it was necessary for us to take a days rest. Mr. Seys betook himself to chair making (at which he seemed not an adept, therefore we cannot recommend him) while some slept, &c.

Friday 14th Thermometer 75 We hurried and got through breakfast that we might have an early start. Zodah was in the advance and our path lay through old farms, and dismal under brush. In crossing a little stream on a log, just as we reached the head of the tree, the shoulder of a broken limb, caused us to change our step and in the act of so doing we lost our balance and was precipitate headlong through the branches and miserable under brush. But luckily, our fall was cheeked by the density of the bushes, and were we drawn by the heels—indeed this was a miserable affair, and fortunate too that we received no injury. After three hours travel, we reached the hill, ascended it, surveyed its where abouts as closely as the density of the undergrowth would permit by employing our cutlasses and billhooks at times and found the locality in our estimation to be far superior to the former two. It was more removed from bamboo swamps, presented a range at different angles pretty picturesque, around lay extensive lands rising and falling for miles.—From the level of the hill, the country could be seen for miles around—water seemed plentiful for use and easy of access—mean height from the level we occupied, according to the estimation we could make, from 120 to 130 ft. Having thus surveyed the place, finding that we agreed pretty much as regard its eligibility, we concluded to end our explorations in the interior so far as Messurado concerned, and turn our attention to the County of Grand Bassa. We thanked Zodah for his kindness in accompanying us, and affording us the facilities he had in being able to make such an ample survey in so short a time, by having paths cut and openings made for observation. Our return was by another rout which brought us through Zodah's plantation, where we were refreshed before reaching town. On our arrival as before, Jinkins had provided our evenings repast, with his former chearfulness and good-will. The eddoe plant grow here in exuriant abundance, one small bush yielding a peck or more

Saturday 15 Thermometer 77. Having ended our labors, we mustered our carriers, arranged our baggage and prepared for our homeward journey. Nothing could have pleased our Kroo boys more than when it was announced we go Cape now. Head aches received lame feet genral, and a number of little diseases incidental to travelers, were all cured. Our head Kroo man, Rope Yarn, who, during the route had complained of a pain in his hip could carry now he was going home two men's portion. We dashed Zodah, and bid him a fair adieu. But here came, a little trouble, for we wish that our fire arms should be kept in order and properly primed, where upon a demand was made for the powder. Tom put away, the powder, then get it Tom—no daddy I hab him Jinkin hab him, no I aint" see him, oh Wallah hab him where is the powder Wallah! I don't no daddy. What! have you let the powder at Sherbro? I tink so.

CONTRIBUTION. The Juvenile Ladies Missionary Society of Buchanan, Miss Frances Labs Directress, presented to Rev. John W. Roberts, (presiding Elder of the Bassa District,) for Missionary purposes the sum of $13 36. How many thirteen dollars and thirty six cents could not thus be raised in the Republic towards constituting a Missionary fund? The Churches here must some day become in a great measure self supporting (if not entirely so.) The Churches here are growing, the expenses of the Missionary cause increasing, questions are being asked, and rights sought after that are entirely impolitic. And the alternatives will soon be, if you cannot grant us such and such ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in you Churches we must discontinue our support. It is well to be mindful in time. Matters that are overcome difficultly at times should claim special attention as much so as an imperative commands. You are advised time and again to aid in the support of the gospel among you. Do something toward the support of your schools. We think says one, that it was time Liberia was doing something for herself in this matter.

Are these not sufficient admonitions for us to begin in time to prepare to meet that future that will certainly break upon us, when all of this work to a great extent will devolve intirely upon our own efforts. Every Church should begin (in however small a manner) to raise its own Missionary fund. Do something; do something in the years, better heed and prepare against the time when it will be said, do all.

THE "DIRIGO." By the Am. Ship Dirigo came materials for the Liberia College. As Citizens, we can but feel grateful to our friends in the State of Massachusetts U. S. A. for their great philanthrophy toward us in thus endeavoring to promote the educational well being of Liberia by endowing her in this early stage of her existence with such an eminent institution of learning.

Massachusetts has raised noble sons at home, but Liberia will also raise sons, who will feel it not to be the least of their duty, to call her blessed also. There are principles of exhaltation marked in mens character through life that their fellows feel prompted to give them the appellation of being good. But when at once, we are met with these eminently disinterested acts of benevolence, we style the benefactors pre-eminently good, worthy to be well spoken of, and held in respectful esteem; As a nation, we should be grateful to God, that he has put it into the hearts of men to be thus kind and benevolent to their fellows, that instead of endeavors to enslave us, they endeavor to enlighten, us, and to exhalt our intellect. We know that there is not one Liberian, but what his heart beats with gratitude. The prospects of our existence are brightening and hope is bearing the tangible realization of long expectation; The glorious era is beginning to shoot forth its ray of intelligence, that shall illumine the dark minds of our heathren brethren, as well as ourselves.

The Ex-President, His Hon. Joseph J. Roberts we learn, have been constituted the President of this institution; success we hope will attend his efforts in this new field of operation, and may he gain to himself no still greater name, as the foster father of the education of the youths of Liberia.

TO LIBERIA.

Brothers of a blacker skin,
—And beljke a whiter mind
For the grace of Christ within
Lightens all of humenkind,—
Take a stranger's offered hand,
Stranger?—no, a brother true,
By the love he bears your land
And the hopes he has of you!

O Liberia, I will trust
Yet to see your injured race,
Like a pillar from the dust,
Raised aloft in honour's place;
Yet to see the happier time,
Recompense for sorrows past,
When in her own sunny clime
Africa wins fame at last.

Therefore, friends, my zeal was bold
To encourage (as it can)
By an honour-mite of gold
Young Liberia's foremost man:
Rise, and take it; merits' prize
Lifts a people's heart and mind
And is precious in the eyes
Of the masters of mankind!

Thou art now the fringe of light,
Edging as with bordered gold
Libya's robe of ancient right,
Dark and terrible of old:
But thou shalt be more than so
For thy lamp shall burn and blaze
Till it eats that night a glow
With the light of seven days!

Therefore would I yield to thee
Our Sierra for thine own;
Where upon the western sea
Thou shalt bless the Torrid zone
Round by Niger's circling stream
Thou shalt sow Religion's seed,
And Philanthropy's young dream
Yet be realized indeed!

MARTIN F. TUPPER.

THE EMIGRANT'S HYMN.

1. I come from the west, from the land of the slave,
To freedom's blest land,
to the land of the brave.
Where base tyranuys yoke
hath never been worn,
Nor the color'd man's race
pointed at with scorn.

2. I am free! I'm as free as the air I breathe,
I've none to obey and
can do as I please.
Liberia's laws I will love
and respect,
And be to her a good
and faithful subject.

3. All hail! young republic,
thy years they are few,
But God will protect thee,
and prosper thee too.
Liberia's flag, long may
its lone star wave,
O'er this land of the free,
this home of the brave.

OBITUARY.

For the Liberia Herald.

THE LAST LOOK.

The path of the just is the shining light that shineth more and more, unto the perfect day, "mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

In all the passage through life, man is subject to sorrow, no one since the great transgression can posibly be exempted, all must share the sad consequences of Sin, and the cry of woe ascends up to the very throne of God; wherever the human foot has trod the soil. The earth was once a paradise but man trod upon it, and then alas it was cursed. The God of nature was made angry, and poor man the creature fell, under an awful frown, because he offended his maker in disobedience to his laws. „Sin came into the world, and death by sin, has passed upon all men," and was that all many sons of Adam might rejoice; but the decree is, that after death the judgment, and what fills up the ful measure of mans woe in this world, may be, summed up in three brief sentences,

His disappointments in pursuit,
Dissatisfaction in enjoyment,
And uncertainty in possession.

No human being can boast over another here as each have their quantum.

We some times begin our short day of worldly pursuits as it were under a shower of heavenly blessings, and the scen of prosperity appears to shine out smilingly on our path, and we rejoice, as the butter fly. when it first bursts from its silken cone, happy to leave its prison house. And then alas in the height of our joy a cloud rises in the horizon, and our path is obscured and gloom hovers around us, a dreary waste appears and often from calamities, of this nature, have aspirants, fallen into dispair. This is seen in all grades of society. In all lands, man is born unto sorrow, and if one had not found a ransom it would be eternal sorrow to all. But thanks be to God who has given us a hope that extends far beyond the grave, and to us who beleive death is not an eternal sleep, oh no, we look to live on through eternal ages to come, and when we fall on sleep from toil and care, in this life it will only be until the general Ressurrection morn. Then we shall rise at the sound of the trump of God into newness of life to be forever with the Lord in glory. Now we only love our God in part, but when this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall the fulness of joy begin, now we know but in part and only see in part, but when that which is perfect is come then all that which is in part shall be done away now in these unrisen bodies, and with these dim eyes we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face, now we know in part but then shall we know even also as we are known I Cor: XIII 9. 12."

How happy is it then for belivers to know and believe this, for then when our friends, and all that we love and hold most dear, depart from us by the rude hand of death, we hope to see them all again in heaven, in that eternal day, which runs parallel with the eternal ages to come. This is the sweet anticipation of Gods people in all lands and when they are receding from this world of sorrow they say to their loved ones of earth, I hasten to my home in the land of eternal ages, be faithful and we shall meet again, I will see you again said our dear saviour to his sorrowing disciples. In this he gave every true beleiver an evidence of a glorious Ressurrection. And while we look around us in the church of God, at the departing of the dying saints, we mingle our sorrow and our joy over one who was near and dear to us all, our dear fellow christian, and fellow citizen, the lamented and lovly Mrs. Caroline Johns, who departed this life on the 15 ult. She was one of those pious ladies whose very silence inspires confidence, and creats friends at a distance who have only heard of such a being. There was a sweet serenity in her whole character, which made it a pleasure to be in her society. Her whole demeanor bore the highest testimony, to religious training, the divine word says „Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." This was truly seen in the character of Mrs. C. Johns, she had the tender care of a pious mother, who taught her in her infancy to lisp the name of Jesus. This grew with her, and in riper years, she found joy in beleiving in that precious name, He who never turns a ways from the prayer of the weakest saint, heard her early petitions and visited her in the way he does all his believing children, and she had the bright evidence that she was born of water and of the spirit, therefore she could in all his ways acknowledge him as her God her deliverer and protector, having this faith and belief she freely trusted in her saviour, knowing that he who "hears the young Ravens when they cry" would hear her prayers, and she sought him early in life, and in death he was her stay, how beautifully does the psalmist express this, Thy Rod and thy staf they comfort me. She was not a person of any ostentation, but as a pious lady loved for being loved, and rendered herself acceptable in all circles in which she moved, and the tongue of virtue with held not from her a due meed of praise, and many pious mothers blessed her. She was reared in the city of Baltimore under the care of a pious mother and as an only child, every attention was paid to her temporal and spiritual welfare; this was the free will offering of a pious mothers heart, and she as a loving and dutiful child rewarded a fond mothers love with the devotion of a fond and obedient heart, Truly then she was an only child, but we must have the charity to believe that notwithstanding the strong attachment between mother and daughter, they did not suffer those attachments, to cause them to be vain as clinging to earthly Idols, as if there was not a time of seperation, no wise christians are thus led, and we are persuaded that Mrs. Johns and her mother, did not live as if there was no time for their seperation, but on the contrary they lived as pilgrims and strangers in this world always making ready to depart, as it does appear for in the providence of God, Mr. Johns visited Baltimore in 1854 his native place, and during his stay became the husband of our deceased sister in Christ, and she came out to this country in 1855, and we are sorry to say that she did not enjoy good health during the whole time of her short sojourn with us but while we express our sorrows on the one hand at our bereavement of a pious lady from our society, we have a great consolation on the other as we feel assured that our loss is her infinite gain, for dear friends who stood by her in her last hours, and even moments, bore the ample testimony, of her happy departure into peaceful joys everlasting And when the hour arrived for her to go home she raised her feble hands to heaven. and, exclaimed with christian fortitude and Zeal, Peace, Peace, oh to find peace in the trying hour of death, is above all things lovely, for those who depart this life in peace, die Kissing God. Thus the righteous cross the cold stream of Jordan leaning on the everlasting arms, and they enter into perfect peace in the presence of God in whose presence is the fulness of joy and at whose right hand there are pleasure forever more.

And for this hour she had been preparing from early youth and when it came her lamp was ready trimmed and bright burning, she feared not to meet her judge for to her the fair fields of paradise ever dressed in living green were far more than all else, she early learned that this was not her home therefore she sought a habitation, and an abiding place e heaven, she looked to the land afar off over against her.

And when the work of the stern messenger was over and death had done his worst, we looked upon the expression of that sweet countenance with admiration not to be forgotten. There she lay in the stilness of death like a babe on a downy pillow taking its rest, and it really did appear that her soul winged its flight to realms of bliss and left the impress of peace and joy in the body. Oh! what a satisfaction it is to have such a revelation of our friends having entered into peace where they are free from all pain and sorrow. And when dear friends gathered round that form, so lovly in death, there came a lonely one in sorrow, all eyes were turned on that lonely one, as he gazed so solmenly on that sweet countenance that in life he once delight to cast upon the loving lingering gaze. And all felt that this was indeed THE LAST LOOK, how thriling was the scene surely every mind was turned to the fairer land, in in thoughts,

Where everlasting spring abides
And never fading flowers
And that death
like a narrow sea divides
This heavenly land from ours

Oh heirs of the everlasting Kingdom, children of the world to come members of Gods house hold of faith keep in mind your hope, oh look through yon cloud that over-shadows your habitation Eternal day lyes there, it is no dark mass that will vanish away or obscura comera, but it is the seat of the endless day. That happy day, That eternity of light, is yours then do not faint nor dispair the prize is in view, We scarsely cease speaking of one of our dear departed friends, before the death knell sounds in our ears again, and we are summons to condole the loss of one whom in her life time we had learned to love, from the many christian graces which shone out in her character. Mrs. J. N. Smith came to this place from Baltimore but a few years ago to make this land of freedom her happy home, and when we consider that she is now no more, we are reluctently almost driven to Exclaim, alas, that she should die so soon, she departed this life on sunday morning about nine o'clock, the 4th inst, and was burried in the Monrovia burrial ground on monday noon the 5 inst. It was pleasing to here he minister in his sermon on the occasion say, Sister Smith was an onament to the christian character This was enough for all, as it spoke volumes on her behalf.

And while we mourn her loss the pleasing though rush in upon us that our loss is her infinite gain oh then let us prepare to meet our God.

SPANISH AMERICA AND SLAVERY.

The rapid decadence of nearly the whole of Spanish America during the last three decenniums of the present century, has been a puzzle to statesmen, historians and philosophers. Some have attributed it to one cause, some to another cause, and some to the compound influence of co-operating causes. One has declared that it had its source in the corrupting influence of the native gold and silver; another that it was due to the general degeneracy of the Spanish race; a third, perhaps, has ascribed it to the political anarchy in which the various Spanish-American States have been plunged since they threw off the yoke of old Spain; and, still a fourth, probably, to all of these combined But all have left out of the argument the most potential of all the facts in the history of those countries—which was the abolition of Slavery coemporaneously with the achievement of their independence, and the attempt to elevate the native Indians and the negroes, mulattoes, mezti zoes, &c., of all shades color, and of every degree or civilization, or rather barbarism, to fo perfect political and social equality with the population of pure Caucasian origin.

This was a fatal error. Instead of improving the inferior class, it only tended to degrade the superior, deteriotate and waste it by amalgamation, and inutillize both. Agriculture was blighted, the useful as well as the elegant arts ceased to be cultivated, the masses were soon immersed in hopeless ignorance and superstition; and this day, outside of Brazil and Cuba, and excepting the few inhabitants of pure Caucasian blood there is scarcely a Spanish-American people which is more advanced than the subjects of the Montezumas and the Incas were over three centuries ago. The countries they inhabit must be reconquered or recolonized to be brought again under the dominion of civilization and made to subserve the uses of agriculture and commerce. New Cortezes and Pizaros—the Vikings and empire builders of the modren world—may there find open and ample fields for their enterprise, prowess and statesmanship. New blood, new ideas and new aims are wanted to reclaim them from the savagery of man, und a new system of Slavery is demanded to rescue them from the wildness of nature. Reforming politics alone will not do; revolution may follow revolution; and still, so long as there is no solid basis of labor—so long as the agricultural and industrial arts are paralyzed, government will pass through successful stages of anarchy until it reaches a state of nihility. In illustration of this, let the history of any of the pseudo republics to which we allude be traced—especially the history of Mexico during the last quarter of a century. Their decadence dates, as we have seen, from the abolition of Slavery, and their regeneration can only be effectually and permanently effected by its restoration. They can only recover from the mongrelism which now darkens and depresses them through Caucasian immigration, and nothing but slave labor can ever reduce the infertile soils and luxuriant wilds to a systematic and profitable agriculture.

We have more than once referred to the necessity of introducing Slavery into Nicaragua as the only means by which Walker and his followers could consolidate and perpetuate their new Republic, because, from the nature of its climate and products, the Anglo American settlers were unable to cultivate the soil profitably themselves, and the native mongrel inhabitants were almost totally worthless and inefficient as free laborers. We also alluded to significant assurances we had received from authorized sources, that Walker designed, as soon as he could prudently do so, to publicly legalize Slavery within his dominions, and invite slave holders to emigrate thither with their slaves. We knew some weeks since that a decree to this effect had been drawn up, and we now learn that it has been promulgated. We confidently pronounce it the wisest, most prescient and statesman like act of his administration. It is the one thing needful. Without it, vain would have been his conquest, vain his invincible army, vain his reconstruction of government and reformation of commerce; without an efficient labor system as a basis, all must, sooner or later, have faded away, like the unsubstantial fabric of a vision. Numbers of slave holders have already written to us to know if they could safely take their slaves into Nicaragua to cultivate sugar, coffee, rice, indigo, or chocolate plantains, as the case may be. We have always assured our correspondents that though slaves were not recognized by law in Nicaragua, we had no doubt they would be secured to their owners during Walker's administration, and that ultimately Slavery would have an established existence there of law as well as fact. They will now find that our confidence in Walker's sagacity and statesmanship was not misplaced. He did not fail to see the necessity which we early pointed out, and, like a bold statesman, he now responds to its demand.

There is another step further also, more difficult, it may be, but scarcely less important, as a primo auxiliary in making the first effective—that is, opening Nicaragua to the African slave trade. We have not time here to elaborate, but a glance at statistics of Slavery will show the great importance of the measure. Labor is in too great demand in our Southeren States to allow many to be withdrawn for Nicaragua; the cooly trade, devised by British policy and carried on by Boston philanthropists, is too hypocritical, too treacherous and inhuman for the civilzers of Central Ameri ca to think of for a moment; and therefore before the African slave trade and African Slavery, conducted on humane principles and regulated by law, must have the preference over every other form of compulsory labor. *N. DEATH AND YOUTH—It was among the loviest customs of the ancients to bury young at morning twillight; for as they strove to give the softest interpretation to death, so they imagined that Aurora, who loved the young, had stolen them to her embrace.

THE MEDICINE OF THE MILLION.

PHILOSOPHY AND FACT.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

The Exciting Cause of Sickness.

The blood is the life-sustaining agent. It furnishes the components of flesh, bone, muscle, nerve, and integument. The stomach in its manufactory, the veins its distributors, and the intestines the channels through which the waste matter rejected in its production, is expelled. Upon the stomach, the circulation and the bowels, these Pills act simultaneously, relieving indigestion, purifying the fluids, and regulating the excretions.

The National Complaint.

Dyspepsia is the most common disease among all classes in this country. It assumes a thousand shapes, and is the primary source of innumerable dangerous maladies; but whatever its type or symptoms, however obstinate its resistance to ordinary prescriptions, it yields readily and rapidly to this searching and unerring remedy.

Bilious Affections.

The quantity and quality of the bile are of vital importance to health. Upon the liver, the gland which secretes this fluid, the Pills operate specifically, infallibly rectifying its irregularities, and effectually curing Jaundice, Bilious Remittants, and all the varieties of disease generated by an unnatural condition of the organ.

A Word to Females.

The local debility and irregularities which are the especial annoyance of the weaker sex, and which, when neglected, always shortens life, are relieved for the time being and prevented for the time to come, by a course of this mild but thorough alterative.

Used throughout the World.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are equally efficacious in complaints common to the whole human race, and in disorders peculiar to certain climates and localities.

Alarming Disorders.

Dyspepsia, and derangement of the liver, the source of infirmity and suffering and the cause of innumerable deaths, yield to these curatives, in all cases however aggravated, acting as a mild purgative, alterative and tonic: they relieve the bowels, purify the fluids, and invigorate the system and the constitution, at the same time.

General Weakness.—Nervous Complaints

When all stimulants fail, the renovating and bracing properties of these Pills give firmness to the shaking nerves and enfeebled muscles of the victim of general debility.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:—

Dropsy	Indigestion	Jaundice	Inflammation
Colics	Dysentery	Asthma	Tumours

THE DENUNCIATION.

Who has done this? Who has brought it upon us? What are the divers organs of the English Press doing in calumnies on the French Government tending to the destruction of confidence between the Governments of the Emperor and our Queen, and to the dissension of the two nations?

The Moniteur warns us of the danger, but does not render us the service of pointing out the sources, the precise quarters in which is working the mischief of undermining the alliance between the two countries. It puts the people of England on their guard, but does not specify against what traitors to the common interests and policy.

Our readers are aware that there are two parts of the Moniteur, headed official and non-official, and under the latter description appears the charge against the British Press, though perhaps it would be more properly placed under the description of the officious.

The calumnies denounced on the part of divers organs of our Press are said to be the more odious, because, being anonymous, they can only be answered by contempt. And this is written in a paragraph carrying the anonymous as far as it can possibly be strained—the charge of an anonymous accuser against anonymous accused. Now we care not a straw for the names of the denouncer, but it much concerns us to know the names of the denounced. It is but fair to distinguish between the offenders and the innocent. Who knows but that we may be all writing calumnies without knowing it; that is to say, calumnies according to the Moniteur. A quotation of the prices of Government securities, or of the true price of bread, which is the very opposite to a Government security, may be a calumny; a question as to the sound policy of the Credit Mobilier, a statement of the prevalence of jobbery and the demoralisation of the Bourse. Perhaps we ought to conform to Figaro's rules for the liberty of the Press and and place on the other side of the Channel. But the very reality of the alliance forbids us to be unobservant or silent upon whatever may concern the prosperity of France. Our interests are so bound up together, that whatever diminishes her strength is so much abstracted from that sum of power which the two nations hold jointly, and exercise for the best interests of the world.

The existing close alliance has made the conduct of affairs in France no long foreign to us. Any errors or calamities embarrassing or weakening her are to us of immediate concern as impairing the power associated with our own. And it is to be observed that the councils of the two countries cannot be in complete union without some equality of conditions. If either state pursue a course involving it in difficulties, that state will of necessity become the more timid and backward in its policy. It will have apprehensions unknown to the other, and will falter in the face of any great enterprise, "letting I dare not wait upon I would." Any great and chronic financial difficulty on either side must paralyse the Anglo-Gallic alliance. And the first evidence of such a disorder will be a wavering in the common policy, a lame execution of some bold, forward move, a feeble breaking down of wisely-planned proceedings.

Interested as the alliance has made us in the condition of France, we of course watch the management of her affairs with an anxiety only next to our interest in our own, and we cannot allow errors in her financial system to pass as things with which we have no concern. We dwell upon them as it is natural to dwell on all objects of fear. Greatly is the Moniteur mistaken if it ascribes to malignant satisfaction, or to any hostile object, the gloomy views of French affairs which have lately appeared in the leading English prints.

What Englishman can wish ill to France or to its Government? Men of all parties, of all varieties and shades of opinion, are agreed on one point, the transcendent value of the French alliance.

Our opinion of the origin of the present regime can never be changed, but our apprehension that the present Emperor would be the servile copyist of his uncle, and the inheritor of his enmity to England, has been signally falsified, for we sincerely believe that our country never had a more faithful and valuable ally. The overthrow of his power we should now regard as a terrible calamity, for we cannot conceive any change of dynasty in France which would not be a change for the worse as respects this

THE MEDICINE OF THE MILLION.

PHILOSOPHY AND FACT.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

The Exciting Cause of Sickness.

The blood is the life-sustaining agent. It furnishes the components of flesh, bone, muscle, nerve, and integument. The stomach in its manufactory, the veins its distributors, and the intestines the channels through which the waste matter rejected in its production, is expelled. Upon the stomach, the circulation and the bowels, these Pills act simultaneously, relieving indigestion, purifying the fluids, and regulating the excretions.

The National Complaint.

Dyspepsia is the most common disease among all classes in this country. It assumes a thousand shapes, and is the primary source of innumerable dangerous maladias; but whatever its type or symptoms, however obstinate its resistance to ordinary prescriptions, it yields readily and rapidly to this searching and unerring remedy.

Bilious Affections.

The quantity and quality of the bile are of vital importance to health. Upon the liver, the gland which secretes this fluid, the Pills operate specifically, infallibly rectifying its irregularities, and effectually curing Jaundice, Bilious Remittants, and all the varieties of disease generated by an unnatural condition of the organ.

A Word to Females.

The local debility and irregularities which are the especial annoyance of the weaker sex, and which, when neglected, always shortens life, are relieved for the time being and prevented for the time to come, by a course of this mild but thorough alterative.

Used throughout the World.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are equally efficacious in complaints common to the whole human race, and in disorders peculiar to certain climates and localities.

Alarming Disorders.

Dyspepsia, and derangement of the liver, the source of infirmity and suffering and the cause of innumerable deaths, yield to these curatives, in all cases however aggravated, acting as a mild purgative, alterative and tonic: they relieve the bowels, purify the fluids, and invigorate the system and the constitution, at the same time.

General Weakness.—Nervous Complaints

When all stimulants fail, the renovating and bracing properties of these Pills give firmness to the shaking nerves and enfeebled muscles of the victim of general debility.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:—

Dropsy	Indigestion	Jaundice	Inflammation
Colics	Dysentery	Asthma	Tumours
Gout	Erysipelas	Debility	Sore Throats
Lumbago	Rheumatism	Fevers of all kinds	Head-ache
Piles	Consumption	Liver Complaints
Blotches on the Skin	Retention of Urine	Ulcers	Secondary Symptoms
Fits	Tic-Douloureux	Ague
Bilious Complaints	Bowel Com plaints	Female Irregularities	Venereal Affections
Stone and Gravel	Scrofula, or King's Evil	Constipation of the Bowels	Worms of all kinds
		Weakness, from whatever cause &c.,

Sold at the Establishments of PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London, and 80 Maiden Lane, New York, also by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the civilized world, at the following prices:—1s. 3d.; 3s. 3d., 5s. each Box.

THE DENUNCIATION.

Who has done this? Who has brought it upon us? What are the divers organs of the English Press dealing in calumnies on the French Government tending to the destruction of confidence between the Governments of the Emperor and our Queen, and to the disunion of the two nations?

The Moniteur warns us of the danger, but does not render us the service of pointing out the sources, the precise quarters in which is working the mischief of undermining the alliance between the two countries. It puts the people of England on their guard, but does not specify against what traitors to the common interests and policy.

Our readers are aware that there are two parts of the Moniteur, headed official and non-official, and under the latter description appears the charge against the British Press, though perhaps it would be more properly placed under the description of the officious.

The calumnies denounced on the part of divers organs of our Press are said to be the more odious, because, being anonymous, they can only be answered by contempt. And this is written in a paragraph carrying the anonymous as far as it can possibly be strained—the charge of an anonymous accuser against anonymous accused. Perhaps we ought to conform to Figaro's rules for the liberty of the Press, and say nothing displeasing to anybody in power and place on the other side of the Channel. But the very reality of the alliance forbids us to be unobservant or silent upon whatever may concern the prosperity of France. Our interests are so bound up together, that whatever diminishes her strength is so much abstracted from that sum of power which the two nations hold jointly, and exercise for the best interests of the world.

The existing close alliance has made the conduct of affairs in France no long foreign to us. Any errors or calamities embarrassing or weakening her are to us of immediate concern as impairing the power associated with our own. And it is to be observed that the councils of the two countries cannot be in complete union without some equality of conditions. If either state pursue a course involving it in difficulties, that state will of necessity become the more timid and backward in its policy. It will have apprehensions unknown to the other, and will falter in the face of any great enterprise, "letting I dare not wait upon I would." Any great and chronic financial difficulty on either side must paralyse the Anglo-Gallic alliance. And the first evidence of such a disorder will be a wavering in the common policy, a lame execution of some bold, forward move, a feeble breaking down of wisely-planned proceedings.

Interested as the alliance has made us in the condition of France, we of course watch the management of her affairs with an anxiety only next to our interest in our own, and we cannot allow errors in her financial system to pass as things with which we have no concern. We dwell upon them as it is natural to dwell on all objects of fear. Greatly is the Moniteur mistaken if it ascribes to malignant satisfaction, or to any hostile object, the gloomy views of French affairs which have lately appeared in the leading English prints.

What Englishman can wish ill to France or to its Government? Men of all parties, of all varieties and shades of opinion, are agreed on one point, the transcendent value of the French alliance.

Our opinion of the origin of the present regime can never be changed, but our apprehension that the present Emperor would be the servile copyist of his uncle, and the inheritor of his enmity to England, has been signally falsified, for we sincerely believe that our country never had a more faithful and valuable ally. The overthrow of his power we should now regard as a terrible calamity, for we cannot conceive any change of dynasty in France which would not be a change for the worse as respects this country. It was said of one of the Roman Emperors, whose rise to power was as bad as his uses of it were good, that either he should never have lived or ought never to die.

We trust that Napoleon III has yet before him much time available for many good purposes, and especially for the correction of errors economic and others. He cannot but see his mistake in tampering with Socialist expedients, and will no doubt make his escape from that false path as soon as practicable. His commercial policy he would reform if he could—the wisdom, the will, are not wanting, but he is trammelled by the Protectionists, whose hostility in present circumstances he is not prepared to brave. The battle of free trade cannot be fought successfully without a free press, and that is an arm which the ruler of France foregoes, his better wisdom wanting the very support which his despotic system suppresses. Hence he is baffled in his wisest and most beneficent schemes. Indeed all the sinister interests seem closing upon Napoleon, as the sands close upon a man in a quicksand. The despotic power gained upon by protectionists, speculators, and jobbers, seems disappearing by inches. It exhausts itself in the repression of liberty, and is feeble against the vices preying on and demoralising the nasion.

Governments, like individuals, become irritable and captious when fretted with difficulties and troubles, and when the French Government raises its voice to school and scold its neighbour, the inference must be that things are not proceeding as smoothly at home as might be desired. Such a manifestation is to be regretted for many reasons, and most of all for the encouragement it will give to Russia, whose game is to separate France and England. For that object she made peace, as to war against the two united nations exceeded her overrated powers. When the prospect of the present patched up peace was rejoicing the sanguine and short-sighted, we took a view of its cause and conseqences, which events are too quickly verifying:

"It is very possible that Russia is sincerely "desirous of an end of the war, in which she finds "herself overmatched. But if so, we may be "sure that she proposes to herself a revenge "for her present mortifications. Her pear was "not ripe. Her war policy was a mistake. "Her strength was the exaggerated repute of "her strength, which has been dissipated by "trial. She has been beaten in every encoun-"ter, but one, her fleets have been shut up to "rot, or destroyed, and her territory has been "occupied by the invading allies. It was not "by force of arms that she made herself what "she is, and by relying on force of arms "she would soon unmake herself. Her success "has been through, other instruments than the "sword. In the arts of intrigue and corruption "she is matchless. Germany, even now under "her influences, shows with what consummate "craft she can wind herself into the places of "influence in foreign states. If she throws down "her arms, it is to resume this winning game. "Much prestige she has lost, but much still re-"mains to her, which a prolongation of the "contest would dissipate. It is her best policy "to save what she can, and to resume the net "of her intrigues all over the world. Peace is "cover for this work. In peace it has made its "advances, and in peace again it will pursue its "serpent-like way. The time may then come "when recourse to arms to consummate wrong "may not be so premature as it has been on this "occasion.

"The first aim will of course be to break up "the alliance which defeated the scheme of "Nicholas. Russia will use all the arts and "devices in which she is so skilled, to disunite "France and England. Her business will be to "sow jealousies and cultivate distrusts. She "will bid any price for French favour. She "would offer France a partition of Prussia, "servile as it has been to her, as she offered "England a share of the Turkish spoil. Her "clearly traced part is mischief maker of Eu-"rope. She has four scores of revenge to "settle, and embroilment must be the means to "the malignant end.

"It must be the fault of the Western Powers "if she succeed, we may be told, for they have "their own safety in their own hands, and have "only to hold together to defy these machina-"tions. This is true, but not assuring: for na-"tions, like individuals, have their moments "of evil temptation and weakness. But be the "result what it may, it will be the misfortune of "Europe for many a day to have to keep watch "and ward against this insidious foe. We "know her purposes, they are all as distinctly "mapped out as her stolen territories, and we "know how inflexibly she holds to her ends, "however she may change her means, and "therefore peace with her is but war in dis-"guise."

The attack on the English Press in the Moniteur marks the first scene in the Russian game

The Examiner.

TREATY
FRIENDSHIP AND COMMERCE BETWEEN THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA
AND
THE STATE OF MARYLAND IN LIBERIA

Whereas a treaty of Friendship and Commerce between the Republic of Liberia, and the State of Maryland in Liberia, was concluded and signed at Monrovia on the fourth day of January in the Year of Our Lord One thousand eight hundred and fifty six by the Commissioners of the respective government for that purpose authorized, which treaty is word for word as follows:—

The Republic of Liberia, and the State of Maryland in Liberia,) it is understood that the term Liberia has no connection with Liberia Proper, being desirous to conclude a Treaty of Peace and Friendship, and to regulate thereby the Commercial intercourse between the territories and citizens of the Republic of Liberia and the territories and citizens of the State of Maryland in Liberia; Joseph Jenkins Roberts, the President of the Republic of Liberia, has, for this purpose, named as the negotiating Party on the behalf of the Republic, Daniel Bashiel Warner, Secretary of State of the Republic of Liberia;

And the State of Maryland in Liberia, by a Commission, bearing date the 20th November, 1855, executed and signed by William Alexander Prout, the Governor of the State of Maryland in Liberia, has authorized, ordained, constituted and appointed Thomas Fuller, Commissioner, to conclude such Treaty on behalf of the State of Maryland in Liberia;

Daniel Bashiel Warner, the Secretary of State of the Republic of Liberia, and the Commissioner of the State of Maryland in Liberia, after having satisfied each other of their respective powers have agreed upon and concluded the following Articles;

ART. I.

There shall be perpetual Peace and Friendship between the Republic of Liberia, and the State of Maryland in Liberia, and between their respective citizens.

ART. II.

There shall be between the territories of the Republic of Liberia, and the territories of the State of Maryland in Liberia, reciprocal freedom of commerce. The citizens of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely to come, with their ships and cargoes, to all places and rivers in the territories aforesaid, saving only such particular parts to which other foreigners shall not be permitted to come, to enter into the same, and to remain and reside in any part of the said territories respectively, also to traffick in such articles as they may think proper, without being restrained or prejudiced by any monopoly, contract or exclusive privilege of traffick whatever, except only such articles, the trafficking in which is prohibited by the laws of the respective countries; and generally, the merchants and traders of each country, respectively, shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce. And in the event of the wreck of the vessels of the one contracting party on the coast of the territories of the other, the local authorities of each country, respectively, shall succor them, and shall secure them from plunder, and shall cause all articles saved from the wreck to be restored to their lawful owners. The amount of salvage dues in such cases shall be regulated, in the event of dispute, by arbitrators chosen by both parties.

ART. III.

Duties or charges on account of tonnage, light or harbour dues, or any other local charges imposed on vessels of the Republic of Liberia, in any of the ports of the State of Maryland in Liberia, shall be the same and no higher than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the State of Maryland in Liberia, and in the ports of the Republic of Liberia, the aforesaid duties or charges on vessels of the State of Maryland in Liberia, shall be the same and no higher than those payable in the same ports on vessels of the Republic of Liberia.

ART. IV.

All merchandize or goods which can or may be legally imported into the State of Maryland in Liberia, if so imported in vessels of the Republic of Liberia, shall be subject to no higher duties, than if imported in vessels of the State of Maryland in Liberia, and, reciprocally all merchandize or goods which can or may be legally imported into the ports of the Republic of Liberia, if so imported in vessels of the State of Maryland in Liberia, shall be subject to no higher duties than if imported in vessels of the Republic of Liberia.

ART. V.

Should the Government of either of the two contracting parties, at any time hereafter, trade in certain articles of import, with a view to raising a revenue by selling them at a fixed advance upon the cost price, it is hereby agreed that in no case shall private merchants be absolutely prohibited from importing any of such articles, or any article in which the respective Governments of the two contracting parties may at any time see fit to trade; nor shall such articles, or any article in which the two Governments respectively may at any time see fit to trade, be subject to a duty of greater amount than the amount of the advance upon the cost price at which the Governments may from time to time be bound to sell the same.

In case the Government of either of the two contracting parties shall at at any time fix the price of any article of native produce, with a view to such article being taken in payment for any articles in which such Government may trade, such article of native produce shall be received into its Treasury from the citizens of the other, at the same fixed price in payment of taxes.

ART. VI.

It being the intention of the two Contracting Parties to bind themselves by the present Treaty to treat each other on the footing of the most favoured nation, it is hereby agreed between them, that any favour, privilege, or immunity whatever, in matters of commerce and navigation, which either Contracting Party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the subjects or citizens of any other State, shall be extended to the citizens of the other Contracting Party, gratuitously, if the concession in favour of that other State shall have been gratuitous, or in return for a compensation as nearly as possible of proportionate value and effect, to be adjusted by mutual agreement, if the concession shall have been conditional.

ART. VII.

The citizens of the Contracting Parties in the territories of each other, shall receive and enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property, and shall have free and open access to the courts of Justice in the said countries, respectively, for the prosecution and defence of their just rights; and they shall be at liberty to employ in all cases, the advocates, attorneys, or agents of whatever description, whom they may think proper; and they shall enjoy in this respect the same rights and privileges therein as the citizens.

ART. VIII.

It shall be free for each of the two Contracting Parties respectively, to appoint consuls, for the protection of trade, to reside in the territories of the other party; but before any consul shall act as such, he shall, in the usual form, be approved and admitted, by the Government to which he is sent.

ART. IX.

The State of Maryland in Liberia engages to co-operate with the Republic of Liberia for the total abolition of the Slave trade, and to prohibit all persons residing within the territories of Maryland in Liberia, in the most effectual manner, from taking any share in the trade; and further engages that a law shall be passed declaring it to be piracy for any citizen or vessel of the said State of Maryland in Liberia to be engaged or concerned in the Slave trade.

ART. X.

It is agreed between the two Contracting Parties that the present Treaty shall be in force for the term of seven years, from the day of its ratification: and, further, until the end of twelve months after either of the Contracting Parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate its operation; each of the Contracting Parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of the said term of seven years, and it is agreed between them, that, at the end of the twelve months extention agreed to on both sides, this treaty and all the stipulations thereof, except that of peace and friendship, shall altogether cease and determine.

ART. XI.

The present Treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Monrovia within the space of twelve months from the date hereof, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the Secretaty of State of the Republic of Liberia, and the commissioner of the State of Maryland have signed the same and have fixed thereto their respective seals.

SEPARATE ART.

The two Contracting Parties reserve to themselves the right to enter hereafter upon such additional stipulations as may appear to them pertinent to the enhancing the benefit of their mutual intercourse, and the promoting of the general interests of their respective citizens. And in the event of any article or articles being concluded by the said Contracting Parties, for giving effect to such stipulations, it is hereby agreed that the article or articles which may hereafter be so concluded shall be considered as forming part of the aforesaid Treaty, and shall have the same force and validity.

D. B. WARNER.
THOMAS FULLER.

And whereas the said Treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Monrovia on the thirtieth day of December 1856 by Daniel Bashiel Warner, Secretary of State of the Republic of Liberia, and James Boyer Mcgill Commissioner, authorized to exchanged the same;—Now, therefore, I Stephen A. Benson, President of the Republic of Liberia, have caused the said Treaty to be made public, to the end that the same and every clause and Article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the Republic of Liberia and the citizens thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the Republib of Liberia to be affixed this thirtieth day of January, in the Year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty seven, and of the Republic the Tenth.

LAWS ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE DURING ITS PRESENT SESSION AND PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY.

AN ACT PROVIDING FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERIOR SETTLEMENTS.

Whereas the American Colonization Society and the Authorities of this government have long entertained the idea, that the mountainous districts in the interior of our country possess superior advantages to the seaboard, for the enjoyment of health, for the pursuit of agriculture, and for the development of the vast resources of our excellent country.

And whereas the American Colonization Society, solicitous to test, by actual experiment, the correctness of the abovementioned supposition so important in its results to the cause of religion and humanity, and to the cure of slavery and redemption of Africa, have generously proposed, through their Special Agent, the Rev. John Seys, to furnish liberal means to establish by and with the consent of this government, interior settlement in the Queah Country, distant about fifty two miles from Monrovia in the County of Montserrado; and have assured the government, that no expense, whatever, will be saved on their part to meet every contingency, and have further declared in due form that, should any difficulties arise with the natives, in which pecuniary embarrassments are involved, the Society pledges to indemnify the authorities of the Republic for any and all such liabilities.

And whereas the said settlement in the Queah Country in the interior of Montserrado County is a test settlement to prove the correctness of the above supposition, preparatory to a general movement by the American Colonization Society to form interior settlements; and creates the necessity of adopting some uniform system whereby interior settlements shall be established and as distant interior settlements, in the midst of large and powerful tribes, cannot be protected unless due prudence be exercised by this government, and each settlement be furnished with the requisite means of defense; therefore,

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled,

Sec. 1. That the American Colonization Society be, and is hereby authorized to establish settlements in the interior of the different Counties of this Republic, under the direction of the President, according to the provisions hereafter ordained.

Sec. 2. It is further enacted, that it shall be the duty of the American Colonization Society to procure the proper company of efficient volunteers, consisting of acclimated Liberian citizens from twenty one to forty five years of age to enlist as permanent settlers. The Amer-

Colonization Society shall also be held amenable to this government for any and all expenses this government may incur in the defense of said settlements; until each of said settlements shall register, as permanent settlers, one hundred able bodied men, between twenty one and forty five years of age, when their special responsibility shall cease and come to an end.

Sec. 3. It is further enacted, that no settlement shall be commenced with a less number than forty volunteers: the number of volunteers may be increased, however, to one hundred; and the privilege of volunteering shall be extended to six months after the commencement of each settlement; provided, moreover, that whenever any of said settlements or any other settlements in Liberia, be in danger of invasion, or have become weak and require to be strengthened, the President may, and he is hereby authorized and empowered to grant to as many volunteers as he may deem expedient enlisting to settle at said places, a town lot and thirty acres of farm land; and cause the Agent of the American Colonization Society, or instruct the Secretary of the Treasury, respectively, as the case may be, to issue or cause to be issued to such volunteers, the rations allowed by law to the Militia in actual service, for a limited time, not exceeding six months

Sec. 4. It is further enacted, that in all cases here after occurring, for which no previous stipulations have been specially entered into between this government and the American Colonization Society, the President shall require full and satisfactory security of the American Colonization Society, that strict conformity will be observed, on their part, to the provisions of this Act, before he grants permission for the formation of any settlement contemplated by this Act, whatsoever.

Sec. 5. It is further enacted, that the American Colonization Society shall also be required to build, as fortresses, two or more block houses, as the President may direct, on the out posts of each settlement, and a suitable one in a central position, as an armory; and the President is hereby authorized and directed to deposit, in the armory of each interior settlement, sufficient munitions of war, of every description, to defend the place against any emergency; and in case of deficiency in the supplies of this government, the President shall cause the American Colonization Society to supply that deficiency.

Sec. 6. It is further enacted, that a Superintendent shall be appointed by the President, for each distant new settlement, who shall have the general supervision of the Civil and military affairs of the settlement, under the direction of the President, and shall be considered, in every respect, as his vicegerent. There shall also be a Commander of the Military, of the rank of Captain, two Lieutenants and a Commissary, to be appointed by the President; and such other subordinate officers, as belong to the different companies of the Militia, shall be appointed by the company.

The Captain, Lieutenants, Commissary, and Agent of the American Colonization Society, shall form a cabinet council, to advise with the Superintendent respecting the most efficient plans of executing the regulations, made and provided for the Military of the settlement, not repugnant to the laws and Constitution of this Republic, and the instructions of the President, to be by him approved before enforced, unless in cases of emergency; not provided for, in law or otherwise.

Sec. 7. It is further enacted, that each immigrant and volunteer residing in, or going to any of said settlements, shall be furnished with, and keep in their possession a good musket, cartridge box and bayonet, which they shall keep in order and use at drills,—And any and all persons that reside in said settlements previous to the registry of one hundred able bodied men from twenty one to forty five years of age, who cannot use a gun efficiently, shall be required to practise marksmanship, at least once a week, and oftener if necessity demand it, in the discretion of the Vigilance Committee, ordained by the 6th section of this Act, until he shall be a proficient marksman.

Sec. 8. It is further enacted, that each volunteer, and such immigrants to whom lands have not been previously assigned, who may go out before the expiration of three years after the commencement of the settlement, shall be entitled to a town lot of one hundred front and two hundred and eighteen feet deep, being about a half acre of land; and a farm lot of thirty acres. to be seven and a half [illegible] front, and forty chains deep, in [illegible] the settlement. [illegible] chains

The method of [illegible] the vicinity of volunteer, w[illegible] shall b[illegible] allotment shall be, that the [illegible] whose name shall be first enrolled, [illegible]ve the first choice, free from any lottery [illegible]ever; and the next on the list shall make his free choice, and so on, to the end of the list; and in like manner with immigrants.

Sec. 9. It is further enacted, that no deed shall be granted in favor of any volunteer, until he shall have resided one full year in the settlement, and shall have produced satisfactory evidence that he has faithfully discharged the duty of a volunteer, and that there are no fines standing against him; provided, further, that in the event of the death of any volunteer while in actual service, the land to which he would have been entitled had he served out his full time, shall be deeded to his heirs, and provided, moreover, that should any volunteer have been honorably discharged from said settlement, from failure of health, or any other justifiable cause he shall have a pro rata portion of the premium lands granted to him according to his time of service.

Sec. 10. It is further enacted, that each interior Township shall be laid out in manner following:

The town proper shall be two miles and one hundred feet square, divided by avenues of one hundred feet, crossing, at right angles, the centre of the town, extending in the country as far as the Township shall extend, or necessity shall require, as highways; and a like avenue of one hundred feet shall be on the four sides of the Town, and to be also extended in the country as far as the Township shall extend, or there shall be necessity of a highway. The farms shall front on the four side avenues, enclosing the town in a hollow square, for one tier, excepting towns situated on rivers, when the farms shall be on either side and on the rear; and there shall be no farms in front between the town and river, but the farms on either side of the town next to the river shall face the river, and after the first tier, the farms shall be reversed and turned crosswise, and front on the avenues running from the town, according to the map or plan hereunto annexed.

Sec. 11. It is further enacted, that the President shall have power to determine the position of the settlements; form and institute such special regulations, as he may in his discretion deem proper, not repugnant to the laws and Constitution of this Republic; provided, nevertheless, that all such settlements shall be considered under martial law for one year, and for a longer time, if the President in his judgment may think proper; unless the Legislature shall otherwise determine.

Sec. 12. It is further enacted, that the settlement to be formed in the Queah country, shall be named Careysburg, in honor of the late Lot Carey, and that all other settlements formed shall be named according to the pleasure of the Legislature.

RESOLUTION CONTINUING THE INTERDICT ON THE GRAND AND LITTLE BUTAW AND BLUE BARREE COUNTRIES TO SANGUINE POINT.

It is Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberian Legislature assembled.

That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and directed, to continue the interdict on the section of country from Sanguine point to Grand Butaw point inclusive, and upon the Blue Barree country, until the Butaw and Blue Barree tribes shall have fully complied with the requisitions of this government; and shall have performed the engagements they have solemnly stipulated to perform and shall have clearly proven by their conduct that they will be submissive to the constitution and Laws of this Republic, and manifested due repentance for their iniquitous conduct; and until the same shall have appeared to the full satisfaction of this government.

And the President be and he is hereby authorized and directed to regulate all matters appertaining thereto accordingly.

AN ACT RELATING TO DIVORCE.

It is enacted by the Sen[illegible] Representatives of th[illegible]e and House of Legislature [illegible] Republic of Liberia in S[illegible] Assembled,—

Sec. 1. That from and after the passage of this Act, any person or persons wishing a Bill or writing of Divorcement for the dissolution of a marriage contract, shall in all cases apply to the Clerk of the Court of Quarter Session of the county where they reside, either by themselves, or attorney, or by both, and shall file a complaint, as in other cases of individual suits, which complaint shall be docketed in the Clerk's book. The Clerk shall issue writs of summons for the party or parties complained against, with subpoenas for witnesses &c, and shall do all other writing usual to be done in cases of individual suits: all leading costs being previously paid by the person or persons applying.

Sec. 2. The said case of divorcement shall, at the next ensuing session of the Court of Quarter Session, be, by the Judge, submitted to a jury, who shall be specially sworn to try and determine the case according to law and evidence, and if, in the opinion of the Court and jury, there are sufficient grounds for the action, and the complaint is sustained, the judge shall then grant a bill of separation or divorcement of the following form, to be written by the Clerk, and signed by the Judge and Clerk of said court, with the seal of the court thereto affixed.

Form;

To all whom these presents doth concern; Know Ye. That, whereas it doth appear to the satisfaction of the court and jury, that, upon the application of Richard Doe for a bill or writing of divorcement from his wife Nelly Doe, it was proven that there are good and sufficient reasons for granting a divorce; therefore,—

The matrimonial connection or civil contract of marriage made and entered into between Richard Doe and Nelly Doe his wife, shall be completely annulled—set aside and dissolved as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if no such contract had ever been entered into between them. And that the said Richard Doe and Nelly Doe his wife shall in future be held separate and distinct persons altogether, unconnected by any mystical union, or civil contract heretofore entered into between them.

(Signed) Judge.

Given under my hand and the seal of the court at my office this day of 18

(Signed) Clerk,

Sec. 3. And it is further enacted, that in no case shall a divorce be granted, except for the cause of infidelity or adultery either in the wife or husband, which must be established upon the oath of good and substantial evidence, or by the confession of the parties. And further, upon the judgment of the Court, the judge shall instruct the clerk to render a categorical account of costs incured in the trial of said case, to be signed by the clerk in his usual manner of signing documents, and placed into the hands of the Sheriff for collection from the parties obtaining the divorce,—with an additional sum of twenty five dollars tax fee, to be paid into the Treasury for county purposes. And if, upon the demand made for the collection of all costs and tax fee, they be unable to pay, they shall give bond and good security in double the amount of cost and tax fee, to be paid within twenty days after; and if the amount is not paid within the time specified, execution, as in other cases of debt, shall issue according to the laws governing the issuing of executions in this Republic.

Sec. 4. And it is further enacted, that in all trials for divorcement, it shall be the duty of the Clerk to keep a minute and correct record of the evidence. And in no case shall forced or extorted confession be admitted as evidence. In all cases of divorce, the father shall bear the expenses of the children, and shall take possession of them, unless the court, in equity, shall decide otherwise for good reasons that may appear to the satisfaction of the court. An appeal shall lie from every decision of the court, to the Supreme Court, under the law now regulating appeals. And the appeal shall be taken up by the court, to which it is made, anew, and upon the merit of the case, and such judgment given as the court of Pleas and Quarter Session ought to have given.

POET'S DEPARMENTS

WAR—SLAVERY.

Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity of shade,
Where rumour of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war,
Might never reach me more. My ear is pained,
My soul is sick, with every day's report
Of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled.
There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart—
It does not feel for man; the natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire.
He finds his fellow guilty of a skin
Not coloured like his own; and having power
To enforce the wrong, for such a worthy cause
Dooms and devotes him as a lawful prey.
Lands intersected by a narrow frith
Abhor each other. Mountains interposed
Make enemies of nations, who had else,
Like kindred drops, been mingled into one.
Thus man devotes his brother, and destroys;
And, worse than all, and most to be deplored
As human nature's broadest, foulest blot,
Chains him, and tasks him, and exacts his sweat
With stripes, that Mercy with a bleeding heart
Weeps when she sees inflicted on a beast.
Then what is man? And what man, seeing this,
And having human feelings, does not blush
And hang his head to think himself a man?
I would not have a slave to till my ground,
To carry me, to fan me while I sleep,
And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews bought and sold have ever earned.
No: dear as freedom is, and in my heart's
Just estimation prized above all price,
I had much rather be myself the slave,
And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him.
We have no slaves at home. Then why abroad?
And they themselves, once ferried o'er the wave
That parts us, are emancipate and loosed.
Slaves cannot breathe in England: if their lungs
Receive our air, that moment they are free:
They touch our country, and their shackles fall.
That is noble, and bespeaks a nation proud
And jealous of the blessing. Spread it then,
And let it circulate through every vein
Of all your empire; that, where Britain's power
Is felt, mankind may feel her mercy too.

SCOTT

THE DEFEATS OF DIPLOMACY

If any one ever entertained a doubt as to the impotence of diplomacy to deal effectually with serious political difficulties, requiring singleness of purpose and strength of will, far more than all the craft of negotiation, the present European crisis ought to cure his scepticism.

Ever since the unfortunate arrangements of 1814, two antagonistic powers have stood front to front in Europe, which may, without great uncharitableness, be looked upon as the contending principles of good and evil. Austria, Russia, and Germany, had it all their own way in the management of that egregious peace. France lay prostrate. England was weary of an unprofitable struggle. Europe was abandoned to chance, or to those jugglers of Vienna and St Petersburg, who well knew how to identify their own respective interests with what they called the cause of order, and the peace of Europe. The diplomatists of England lost at Paris and Vienna, as much as her heroes of the Peninsula and Waterloo had gained in her behalf.

In 1830, France assumed a new attitude, she took her station in Europe; a better understanding with England had become a possibility, and an alliance between the two Western nations would have more than counterpoised the Northern or despotic powers. Yet from 1814 to 1830, and again from the latter year to the present day, the Western Powers have been worsted in every encounter, and always because they failed to understand, that what their adversaries call the "cause of order," deserves in truth a very different name, and the vaunted "Peace of Europe" is only a "war in masquerade," a war in which England and France are beaten as effectually as with the sword.

Not to wander from the point upon which the eyes of all Europe are fixed at present, let us glance at the Neapolitan question. Who is the promoter of disorder, who is the Peace breaker in Italy? The negociators of 1814 were not content with restoring to Austria the possessions usurped by Charles V Leopold I, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but they added to her the territories of an inoffensive and friendly state; imitated one of the most flagrant public crimes of the first Napolean, and enriched Austria with Venice as well as Milan. Nay, they even allowed her to possess great strongholds beyond her own frontiers of the Po and the Ticino, at Piacenza and Ferrara, in the Parmetan and Roman States, to guard against all chances of new French inroads. Beyond his point they certainly never meant that she should go; yet as they well knew that the so-called independent State of Italy lay in utter helplessness at her mercy, they should either have made up their mindr to her ultimate occupation and absorption of the whole peninsula, or (if actuated by a wise concern for the peace of Europe), they should have agreed to make Austrian encroachment on a single inch of Italian ground beyond the ample share already allotted to her, a casus belli between themselves and that grasping power. Instead of this, when Austria marched from one end to the other of the Peninsula, when, in 1820-1, she occupied Naples and Piedmont; and in 1831-2, the Roman States, the Western Powers were easily persuaded, or affected to be persuaded, that she wss acting an honest conservative part; England stirred never a foot in the matter, and France flattered herself that a check could be put on Austrian preponderance by an isolated and temporary occupation of a sea port in the Roman States.

The consequence of this timid policy was, that the power of Austria appeared to the Italians as irrisistible as it was odious, and the Austrian Government, no less than the Italian Princes under their patronage, used their advantage with such ruthless severity as to drive the tortured and trampled people into revolutionary excesses, the guilt of which was the guilt of Austria not of Italy. It was the long continuance of Austrian supremacy that not only rendered order in Italy an impossibility, but by stretching the power of that empire beyond the limits assigned to it, aroused the tardy jealousy of the rival powers, and deprived Europe of any chance of a solid and durable peace.

Up to the year 1848, the exaggerated and almost fabulous notion of the extent of the combined power of Austria, Germany, and Russia, no less than the great commercial interests that England and France had at stake, and still more the want of cordiality between the two latter nations, made them slow to engage in a struggle of which the issue seemed at least doubtful, and the cost at any rate very great Hence it had become the habit of the Northern despotisms to swagger in the face of Europe, to use "such "talk as Boreas with Auster holds," and offer under every pressure to refer all disputes to the abitrament of the sword; whilst, on the contrary, nothing could equal the meek conciliatory tone of France and England, who so far as Poland, Hungary, Italy, or any other of the unrepresented nations were concerned, hardly ever once combined to insist on the fulfilment of the Treaties of 1814. Thus, in 1848, Austria having laid Piedmont prostrate, overrun the Duchies, Tuscany and the Papal States, haughtily replied to all pacific remonstrances and entreaties of the Western Powers that she would take her own way in Italy, and brook no interference with her government or designs there, any more than in any other part of her empire. France and England (not yet allied, as at present) were unready for war, as was indeed Austria herself, who was at that very period unable to make head against the revolt in Hungary. The Western Powers must have been well aware of her real weakness, but Germany and Russia loomed in the back ground, and France and England were not only anxious to avoid a rupture with those great despotic bugbears, but flattered themselves they had it always in their power to avoid one. They found out their mistaken only five years later, but then again they flattered themselves that they could always detach Austria and Germany from Russian interests; they accepted the proffered friendship, or rather submitted to the treacherous neutrality, of those crafty Powers; they allowed them to hinder them in their warlike operations, and to hoodwink them in their pacific transactions. They patched up a peace with the North ere the great contest had been fairly fought out; they allowed Austria all the advantages of victory, and signed a treaty (the diplomatic pendant of the famous Vienna Note) which leaves them further off than ever from the triumph of the Cause of Order further than ever from the settlement of the Peace of Europe.

What happens now? France and England have barely [illegible] ments from the Crimea to withdraw their armaan expedition to Naples has [illegible]ions, when already acknowledged necessity. The expedition matter of scarcely resolved upon when the Western Powers discover, what they might have known before, that Naples is only a little shoot of a mighty plant, the roots of which lie at St Petersburg and Vienna, so that either the contest with the North must be renewed, or the projected demonstration in Italy must be the idlest display.

Thus have we traced the futile course of Western diplomacy; we have seen its blindness and improvidence in the transactions of 1814, misled by an over-anxious desire for peace; we have seen it even consenting to flagrant and frequent violations of peace for the sake of preserving it; we have seen it not only willfully and consciously sacrificing the very existence of defenceless nations. but even the most material interests of the Western Powers themselves, allowing the Northern Powers to increase by the annexation of territories blotted, one after another, out of the roll of self-existing states. At length, after losing every inch of ground in 1820, in 1848, &c, in Poland, at Cracow, in Italy, at Parma, Modena, Florence, and Rome all with a view to the preservation of peace, it discovered in 1854 that war was inevitable; but even then hoped to ward off a great war by waging a little one. The little war in which it engaged us has ended in a peace worthy of it, and Europe is as far as ever from security against the powers combined to enslave her.

Will Western diplomacy follow its undignified course one step further? Will it descend "so low in the predicament" as to strike its colours to the King of Naples? To this it comes when nations fling great opportunities away. Austria was weak in 1848. Russia would be tame enough to-day, had the war been prosecuted with a vigour to entitle us to dictate the terms of peace. We are at our Italian negotiations again, with less advantage than ever in our favour, a feeble war having impaired the prestige of our arms, and the Treaty of Paris having added as little to our dignity and power in negotiation. The Examiner.

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST PERSIA.

By the last accounts from India this expedition would still seem to be presevered in. Even the number of the troops to be employed is reported to have been raised from 10,000 to 15,000, while a whole fleet has been hired to transport them to the Persian Gulf.

In addition to what we stated not long since on the folly of this adventure, we have a few observations to make. By rescuing the inland towns and states of Herat from the Persians, who are supposed (only supposed) to be about to assail them, we are, forsooth, to save our Indian dominions from the danger of Russian invasion and conquest The Russian capital, the centre of the real power of Russia, is as the crow flies about 2,500 miles from the nearest part of India and it would require eight months' march to reach it if a Russian army were unopposed. But let it be imagined that a Russian army competent to the invasion and conquest of British India were assembled on the eastern shore of the Caspian, even then the distance in a straight line is still 1,000 miles from India, and it would require 100 days to effect the march, no enemy interrupting it. In one-third part of that time a British army would reach the scene of the invasion from the Thames, and in one-half of it be at Attock to meet the gallant Muscovites after they had forced the Khyber pass!

But what progress have the Russians really made in advancing on the route we have indicated? They have conquered from the semi-barbarous Persians a few provinces immediately bordering on their own, and that is all. They invaded the rude Tartar state of Kiva, but 300 miles distant from their own frontier on the Caspian, and were beaten back with the loss of the best part of an army of 20,000 men. The mountaineers of the Caucasus have foiled them for thirty years. The Russian territory is conterminous with those of the two richest and least warlike nations of Asia, the Chinese and the Japanese; and although both have treated them contumeliously, they have never attempted to invade them, from sheer want of power, and yet they frighten our diplomatists out of their propriety, when 1,000 miles of rugged, roadless, and inhospitable land lies between us. They do this, too, just after we have drubbed them on their own territory. It is, indeed, too bad, just after ascertaining, at the expense of sixty millions, that the Russians find it no easy matter to defend themselves even on their own soil, to be told that they may any day make a clear spring of 4,000 miles from Petersburg to Calcutta, and kick ourselves and one hundred years' labours into the Bay of Bengal

But let us suppose that by a miracle Russia has effected the conquest of the vast territory and of the many tribes which lie between the Caspian and the Indus. She would obviously in such a case be in mere military occupation of a vast resourceless region, inhabited by turbulent and warlike barbarians, antagonistic to them [illegible] in race, manners, and religion, and that foreign [illegible] been permanently subdued by any then be British [illegible] The neighbour of Russia would trious population, its with its docile and industand well organised army. [illegible]rent-yielding land, most at her own door, France requ[illegible] Algiers, alof 100,000 men, and an expenditure of [illegible]army, 000*l.* of French revenue. Double the number of Russians would not be garrison enough for the rude region thus occupied by Russia, supposing there were any means of paying for the occupation. We ourselves attempted the conquest of a mere fraction of the territory we are supposing the Russians to occupy, on their way to wrest India from us, and, after a two years' struggle, we were ignominiously defeated.

The Indian revenue is not by any means in a condition to waste treasure in guardian against imaginary danger. This very year (we have it on the authority of the Marquis of Dalhousie) expenditure exceeds revenue by 1,800,000*l.*, which is equal to a tithe of the clear income, and in proportion to our own revenue equivalent to a deficient of some 6,000.000*l.* Moreover the Indian Government, in its need, opens a loan and no one will subscribe; and all this is the upshot of conquests and anexations, which have increased the revenues of India by the sum of 4,330.000*l.*

FRANCE.—The Question of the Day.—An article has appeared in the "Siecle" on the English alliance which it warmly defends, The Republican print ably supports the policy of maintaining the occupation of the Black Sea, and shows that this occupation has been purposely misinterpreted by the partisans of the Russian alliance. The following are passages from the article:—"Had our adversaries read the firs article of the treaty of paris they would have seen that it is not a question of a new congress. Each Power guarantees the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, not only jointly with the other Powers but also separately. This is clearly expressed. Moreover, the word 'separately' involves each Power to the extent of its guarantee. England, has not only guaranteed that integrity in concert with France and Austria, it has likewise guaranteed it alone, and France and Austria are are in the same position. England does not require our consent to remain in the Black Sea, nor should we require hers in order to protect the Ottoman empire from any danger that might arise. We repeat that the partisans of the Russian alliance have proposely rendered this question obscure. Not only have they sought to cast odium on the conduct of England, but they have caused the French press to lose sight of the exact notion of the rights conferred on France by treaties. They have misled the public. When we seek to re-establish the truth it is solely in the interest of our country, which may find itself one of these days in the position of England. The treaty of guarantee allows to each Power the right of separate guarantee. This right is ours; why therefore refuse it to England? We have been reproached with exaltation. Nevertheless, we reason with moderation, and we appeal to the common sense of the public. Let those journals which abuse us enter into a more minute study of the question; they will discover their error. . . We maintain what we have said respecting the secret intention of the ultra-Conservatives of Europe, and on the necessity of the firmest alliance between France and England—a genuine alliance, in which each Power will preserve its liberty of action and sovereign independance. The boldness of the reactionist renders this alliance more than ever necessary. Since the peace we have witnessed the attempt at Neuchatel, the circular of Prince Gortschakoff, the resistance of the King of Naples, and the Royalist revolution in Spain. These events should teach us prudence, for either they have no signification or they are the forerunners of others. The intimate union on a footing of equality of the two great." Western nations can alone conjure the danger."—The Examiner.

Please insert in your collums an extract of a letter received from a friend in Augusta Georgia of the proceeding of the African Baptist Church which may be interesitng to Liberians generally.

"The church in hearing of the sufferings of the people in the county of Sinoe took the matter into consideration and formed a committee to collect means for the relief of the sufferers, the amount collected on the 3rd Sabbath in October $75, Tuesday night following $30 Thursday night following $19, bear in mind this was just after collections for poor associations pastors besides the chair Gave Twenty dollars. The Benevolent society Twenty five,—together with some amounts not mentioned making one hundred and eighty six dollars which was fowarded to Mr. Wm. Crane of Baltimore to buy suitable provisions and clothing stuffs. All of which is to be fowarded to our Missionary and the Govert Agent, I believe Rev. R E. Murray for distribution, it afforded us pleasure to see the liberality of Monrovia. Our Missionary society still servives, we have collected about one hundred dollars this year, of which we have remited [illegible] dollars and the church seperate and apart from society, forty dollars. I find our society has collected over one thousand since its organization. (This amount is collected from the walker Mission society at say 5 cents per month from each member.")

THE MEDICINE OF THE MILLION.

PHILOSOPHY AND FACT.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

The Exciting Cause of Sickness.

The blood is the life-sustaining agent. It furnishes the components of flesh, bone, muscle, nerve, and integument. The stomach is its manufactory, the veins its distributors, and the intestines the channels through which the waste matter rejected in its production, is expelled. Upon the stomach, the circulation and the bowels, these Pills act simultaneously, relieving indigestion, purifying the fluids, and regulating the excretions.

The National Complaint.

Dyspepsia is the most common disease among all classes in this country. It assumes a thousand shapes, and is the primary source of innumerable dangerous maladies; but whatever its type or symptoms, however obstinate its resistance to ordinary prescriptions, it yields readily and rapidly to this searching and unerring remedy.

Bilious Affections.

The quantity and quality of the bile are of vital importance to health. Upon the liver, the gland which secretes this fluid, the Pills operate specifically, infallibly rectifying its irregularities, and effectually curing Jaundice, Bilious Remittants, and all the varieties of disease generated by an unnatural condition of the organ.

A Word to Females.

The local debility and irregularities which are the especial annoyance of the weaker sex, and which, when neglected, always shortens life, are relieved for the time being and prevented for the time to come, by a course of this mild but thorough alterative.

Used throughout the World.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS are equally efficacious in complaints common to the whole human race, and in disorders peculiar to certain climates and localities.

Alarming Disorders.

Dyspepsia, and derangement of the liver, the source of infirmity and suffering, and the cause of innumerable deaths, yield to these curatives, in all cases however aggravated, acting as a mild purgative, alterative and tonic: they relieve the bowels, purify the fluids, and invigorate the system and the constitution, at the same time.

General Weakness.—Nervous Complaints

When all stimulants fail, the renovating and bracing properties of these Pills give firmness to the shaking nerves and enfeebled muscles of the victim of general debility.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:—

Dropsy	Indigestion	Jaundice	Inflammation
Colics	Dysentery	Asthma	Tumours
Gout	Erysipelas	Debility	Sore Throats
Lumbago	Rheumatism	Fevers of	Head-ache

LAWS ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE DURING ITS SESSION AND PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY.

Export Duty Bill.

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.

Sec. 1st That, from and after the passage of this Act, all vessels—whether foreign, or Liberian—arriving on the Liberian Coast from any foreign port, shall, before stopping at any of the trading points along the Coast, enter at one of the ports of entry. And in all cases there shall be placed on board of every such vessel by the collector, immediately on her arrival, an Inspector furnished with locks and keys, who shall remain on board in posession of the hatch or hatches of said vessel during her stay on the Coast; or at least, until such vessel shall have discharged all her cargo, taken on board all her freight, and cleared from one of the Liberian ports of entry for a foreign port.

Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the Inspector to Superintend the discharging of all the cargo from on board of the vessel on which he is placed; to note each package, barrel or box; the kind, quantity and quality of the freight landed, and see that no article of trade whatever, be landed without his notice. He shall cause the hatches to be locked at unsensonable hours; and shall retain the keys in his possession at all times during the loading or unloading of said vessel. He shall examine the vessel of which he is in charge, to see whether any goods are, or can be landed without his knowledge. And if, in his opinion, the master, supercargo, owner, or any person engaged on board of said vessel, be inclined to smuggle goods or merchandize to or from the same, he shall instantly make report thereof officially to the Collector, who shall immediately proceed to examine the validity of said report; and should he find sufficient reason or grounds for said report, he shall enter a complaint to the Attorney General of the Republic, or Attorney of the County, as the case may be, who shall prosecute vigorously the parties thus reported by the collector. And in all cases in which any person or persons are convicted of smuggling, he, she, or they shall be fined in any sum not exceeding ten thousand nor less than five hundred dollars, in addition to the confiscation of the vessel and cargo, according the magnitude of the crime, at the discretion of the Judge of the Admiralty Court.

Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of the Inspector, as often as he shall be required by the Collector, to make true and correct returns to him of all goods or merchandize landed from on board of the vessel of which he is in charge—as provided for in the second section of this Act—and of all produce received on board of said vessel, the number of Puncheons, Barrels, Boxes, Bags, Billets, Packages, Rolls, Bundles, &c; the kind, quantity and quality of produce—howsoever put up—shipped on board for foreign market. He shall allow nothing to be landed or shipped from, or to said vessel, unless between the hours of six o'clock A. M., and six o'clock P. M., before and after which time, all of the hatches of said vessel shall be locked, and the keys retained by the Inspector, as before specified. He shall at all times, when required by any officer or officers of the Revenue, give any and all information, of which he may be in possession, calculated to enforce the Navigation, Commerce and Revenue laws of this Republic.

Sec. 4. It shall be the duty of the Collector, or any other officer of the Revenue, to give information of any neglect on the part of the officer or officers of the Navy to the Attorney General, or County Attorney, as the case may be and said officer or officers, if convicted, shall be fined in any sum not less than one hundred nor more than ten thousand dollars, according to the magnitude of the case. For the neglect of any Inspector to note and take a correct account of all goods and merchandize landed or unlonded, and for neglect of duty in violation of the 2nd and 3rd sections of this Act, he shall be fined in any sum not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, in the discretion of the Judge of the Court having cognizance of the same. And for the neglect of any officer or officers of the Revenue, in command of any government vessel, to obey any order or command issued by the President or Secretary of the Treasury, he or they shall be fined in any sum not less than two thousand nor more than fifteen thousand dollars, in the discretion of the Court; and for his or their refusal to render aid to the Collector or Inspector when called upon, he or they shall be fined in any sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars. The Court of Admiralty shall try and determine any and all of the above named cases; and in case of failure on the part of the defendant or defendants, to pay the above mentioned fines, he or they shall be imprisoned for any length of time not less than one nor more than five years, according to the magnitude of the crime.

Sec. 5 And it is further enacted: That any master, supercargo, or owner of a vessel—Liberian or foreign—who shall come or anchor within the Liberian waters and refuse to receive on board an Inspector, shall be fined as follows; for the first offence, one hundred dollars; for the second offence, one thousand dollars; and for every similar refusal or offence, one thousand dollars; nevertheless the Inspector shall not, when he has been once refused, attempt to board the vessel a second time, until he shall have informed the Collector of his refusal. And in all cases, when there is an attempt to smuggle, or land any goods, wares, or merchandize otherwise than is now provided for by law, the master, owner or supercargo shall be fined in any sum not less than one thousand nor more than ten thousand dollars in addition to the confiscation of the vessel and cargo, in the discretion of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty.

Sec. 6. And it is further enacted; That an export duty shall be levied, assessed and collected by the Collector, on the following named articles: That is to say, on all Palm-oil, a specific duty of one cent on each gallon; and on all articles of export not herein named, there shall be collected a duty of two per cent, advalorem; and on gold or silver coin, there shall be an export duty of five per cent.

Sec. 7. And it is further enacted; That each Inspector shall receive from this Government for services, one dollars per day; his board and lodging shall be furnished by the vessel on which he is placed; any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

An act authorizing an appropriation to build a Jail at Robertsport Grand Cape Mount.

Whereas it appears that Robertsport Grand Cape Mount, is not provided with a suitable place to confine those who offend the laws of this Republic, and as it also appears the said Robertsport is under a government superintendant, and has no town charter, or authorities to provide the same.

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature Assembled,—

Sec. 1st. That the sum of ($ 500 00) five hundred dollars be, and the same are hereby appropriated to build a jail house 14 by 18 feet, and 10 feet high, and to furnish the same with all the necessary articles to secure the prisoners when it shall be required of the Sheriff to take said prisoners to the County Jail. And the President is hereby authorized to draw the aboved named amount out of any money in the Government Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

AN ACT AUTHORIZING THE ESTABLISHING OF A FARMING SETTLEMENT IN BASSA COUNTY TO BE CALLED FARMERSETTA.

Whereas the Legislature at its session in December 1855 and January 1856 &c, passed an act appropriating the amount of one hundred dollars for the erection of bridges in the settlement situated on the north-west side of the St. Johns river called upper Edina in the County of Grand Bassa: And whereas the said Legislature did not make any provisions for laying out a road in said settlement according to the wishes of the Citizens thereof! And whereas we believe it necessary that there should be laid out, and planned a regular road or causeway through said settlement, so as to encourage and facilitate the citizens or settlers thereof in their operations as farmers. Therefore,—

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.—

Sec, 1. That immediately after the adjournment of the present Session of the Legislature, the President authorize the Superintendent of the County of Grand Bassa to instruct one of the Surveyors of said County to survey and lay out the said Settlement or farming district as follows. That is to say the said Settlement shall commence at the junction of rivers. Mechlin and St Johns on the South-west, running in a northerly direction along the banks of the St. Johns, until it reaches the boundary line of lower Bexley or New Haven, thence along the said line in a North-westerly direction for the space of two miles interior of the river St. Johns, thence in a straight line of a South-westerly direction until it reaches the banks of the said Mechlin river; The said farming district or settlement to be called "FARMERSETTA."

Sec. 2nd, And it is further Enacted, that the superintendent under the direction of the President, be authorized and instructed to arrange with the Citizens of said Settlement for enough of their lands as will be necessary to be taken up for a common road under the following provisions, that is to say, for a space of fifty feet of land in front, lying on the banks of the St. Johns, they shall receive seventy five feet of land on the back of their farms.

Sec. 3rd. That the Surveyor be instructed to Survey and lay out a road commencing on the point at the junction of the rivers St. Johns and Mechlin at the most suitable place to be selected by the said Surveyor to run in the direction of the river St. Johns, twenty feet from high water mark parallel with the said river running through the farming district of Farmersetta until it reaches and connects with the road in New Haven, the said road to be thirty feet wide, and for surveying, laying out and giving the direction of said road, the surveyor shall receive the sum of five dollars per day—provided however, that no more than six days shall be allowed for the completion of the same.

Sec. 4th, It is further Enacted, that in addition, to the one hundred dollars appropriated at the last Session of the Legislature for the erection of bridges &c, in the said Settlement, there be appropriated, the sum of one hundred dollars more, in order that the provisions of this Act may be more effectually carried out;—and that the President be and he is hereby authorized to draw on the public Treasury for the same: And further, that the President be authorized to instruct the Superintendent of the County of Grand Bassa, to have the said work put out at the lowest bidder, and that he be authorized to enter into contract with the undertaker for the speedy performance of said work. The contractor or undertaker shall be required to give good and sufficient bond for the performance of said work.

Sec. 5th. It is further Enacted that the President be and he is hereby authorized to draw the above amount of one hundred dollars approated by this Act in addition to that before appropriated out of any monies in the public Treasury.

AN ACT PERTAINING TO BOUNTY LAND.

Whereas in the establishment of this Government among the aboriginal inhabitants of this country has required the exposure of its citizens, to the most trying circumstances; causing the loss of health, life, and property. And whereas, it is the policy of this Government to hold out inducements to its citizens, to encourage them to repel aggression, and put down all attempts against the peace and dignity of Liberia, and uphold the majesty of the Laws Therefore.—

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.—

SEC. 1st That from and after the passage of this act, each commissioned and non-commissioned officer, musician or private, whether volunte'r or Militia, who performed Military service in any regiment, campaign, or detachment in the service of this Republic, when it was a Colony in any Battle or campaign since January 1st 1822, or in any of the Wars, or campaigns since that time; shall be entitled to Lands as follows. Those who served from two days, up to one week, shall receive five acres. Those who served fifteen days, shall receive ten acres. Those who served over twenty, and less than one months, shall receive fifteen acres. And those who served over one month, and less than three months, shall receive thirty acres.

SEC. 2nd It is further Enacted, that each commissioned and non commissioned officer, musician and private, for whom provisions are made by the first section hereof, shall receive a cirtificate from his commander, or if the commander be dead, then he or they shall make oath, that he or they, are the identical persons, or if dead, his widow may make oath, that her husband was actually in service. And if minors, a competent evidence shall make oath to the above facts before any Justice of the Peace, or any officer competent to take such an oath. And that such Certificates, shall be filed in the Land commissioner's office of the County, where such persons reside. Upon the filing of such Certificates, the Land Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall order the Land surveyed from any Public Lands, not otherwise appropriated, at the expense of the claimant or claimants.

SEC 3rd And further, in the event of the death, of any commissioned or non-commissioned officer, musician or private prior or subsequent to the passage of this Act, who shall have served as aforesaid, a like certificate being presented, a deed shall be executed in favour of his heirs.

SEC. 4th And it is further Enacted, that it shall be the duty of the Land Commissioner to have the Land located on farming districts, as may be designated by the individual applicant under the provisions laid down in the second section of this Act. He shall as soon as the Lands are surveyed and ploted, and the returns made to him by the surveyors, grant a deed to the individual applying in fee simple. All such certificates shall be by him, filed in the State Department quarterly. He shall receive fifty cents for such deed, to be paid by the applicant. And that the President shall lodge or caused to be lodged in the hands of the Land Commissioner in each of the counties of this Republic a number of blank deeds signed by him in his usual manner of signing deeds for land. And on presentation of the certificate as provided for in this second section, the Land Commissioner shall have the the land surveyed as provided for, in the foregoing provisions. He shall then fill up the deed with the number of acres, mentioned in the certificate and deliver the same, countersigned by the Land Commissioner, to the claimant.

AN ACT AUTHORIZING THE APPROPRIATION OF $3000,00 FOR EXPLORING AND OPENING ROADS INTO THE INTERIOR OF THE SEVERAL COUNTIES.

Whereas it is the policy of this government to encourage its citizens in every laudable enterprise, and as the exploring of the interior of our country is a great desideratum; and as it appears from a petition of certain citizens of Grand Bassa County that they are willing to engage in the exploration of their interior if encouraged by the government. Therefore,

It is Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.

SEC, 1st That the sum of three thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby annually appropriated for exploring and opening roads into the interior of Montserrado, Grand Bassa and Sinoe counties.

SEC, 2d That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to appoint in each county, three discreete persons as commissioners of Interior Roads and explorations, one of whom shall be a surveyor. It shall be the duty of said commissioners to explore the interior of the county for which they may be appointed under direction of the President, they shall keep a correct journal of their transactions, furnish an accurate map of the country over which they travel; showing the direction of highways and water courses, situation of towns and villages;—and give a discriptive account of the number and character of the inhabitants, productions, and resources of the country.

They shall be invested with power to purchase territory from, and negotiate treaties with the independent Chieftans residing beyond the limits of this Republic according to the instructions of the President, and shall be especially commissioned to treat with the native tribes, to secure the pre-emptive right to their lands and territories should they be disposed at any future time to sell them, and shall in all cases endeavor to extend by treaty stipulation, the jurisdiction of this Republic.

And said commissioners shall also have a concurrent jurisdiction to settle native difficulties on their rout within our jurisdiction, as the Native Commission Court.

SEC, 3d Said commissioners shall make a quarterly report of all matters charged in their commission as stated in the second section of this act; And they shall be furnished with such assistants as the President may deem expedient to carry out the provisions of this act. and they shall receive for their services twenty five dollars ($25,00) per month while employed in surveying and exploring, and ten cents per mile, and shall be allowed fifty cents per diem in addition to their salary while engaged in settling native difficulties.

SEC, 4th The time of commencing said explorations shall be as soon after the passage of this act as practicable, and in every year after, to commence on the first of November and end, on the thirty first of May following (seven months in each year)

NATIONAL WHIG CONVENTION.

Pursuant to notice, the National Convention met in the Representative Hall, on Friday evening, 30 January, at 7 o'clock.

Hon. E. W. Wright was called to the Chair, and Mr. F. P. David appointed Secretary.

The object of the meeting was stated, as being to nominate candidates for *P*resident and Vice *P*resident of the Republic, for the ensuing biennial election in may.

The Delegates from the different settlements presented their credentials and were duly accredited.

The Convention then adopted the Republican Whig *P*latform of *P*rinciples promulgated by them in 1855, as the basis of their labors for the present political campaign.

The *R*ules of the Whig Convention of 1855 were then adopted. It being agreed to vote by Ballot, *H*on. A. B. Hooper and Armisted Miller Esqr, were appointed Tellers.

Mr. Henry Williams, of Clay *A*shland, then nominated His Excellency Stephen *A*llen Benson, for *P*resident. This motion was seconded in a speech full of truth and praise to our distinguished Chief Magistrate, and the audience expressed their approbation of the speaker's remarks by loud plaudits.

The Vote having been taken it was found that the Hon. Stephen *A*llen Benson was unanimously elected as the Nominee for *P*resident of the Republican Whigs.

Mr. J. O. Mc'Beth then nominated Genl John Nostedler Lewis, as Vice *P*resident. After some appropriate remarks the ballot was taken, when it was found that the distinguished gentleman received all but one vote for the Nominee as Vice *P*resident.

On motion of J. B. Jordan a Committee of five was appointed to wait on the distinguished candidates to inform them of their nomination, and to report to the Convention immediately. J. B. Jordan, S. S. Gray and H. Williams, were named by the Chair, the House named the Honorable Chairman and Mr. Thomas Chester Fairchild.

The House called Mr. A Miller to preside pro tem.

*A*fter the lapse of an hour the Committee returned and through their Chairman reported—

*T*hat they had waited, in accordance with their instructions, on *H*is Excellency Stephen *A*llen *B*enson, and having informed him of his Nomination by the Republican Whig Convention as *P*resident of this Republic at the approaching election; he stated that he was pleased with the honor conferred upon him; with their praises of his course, and, that in the event of his being re-elected, he would do all that lay in his power for the advancement, of the honor and glory of our Country. He hoped that he would be able to meet them soon when he could express more satisfactorily his thanks, and begged the Committee to assure the members of the Convention of his high sense of the honor conferred by them upon him.

The Committee next waited on Genl. J. N. Lewis and informed him of his nomination by the Republican Whig Convention as Vice President, at the approaching election in May. The General thanked the Committee and through them the Convention for the honor they had conferred upon him; he assured them that he received the information with pleasure; he would indorse their acts with hearty cheer, and would do every thing in his power to promote the Principles set forth by the Republican Whig Party.

The acceptances of these gentlemen were received with loud acclamation and three right hearty cheers.

Executive business was then brought forward, when J. B. Jordan was appointed Chairman for the next two years of the Republican Whig Executive Committee assisted by a Committee consisting of eight—

The Convention then ordered that the Report of this meeting be published in the "Herald."

The thanks of the Convention having been tendered to the Chairman and Secretary for their kind services, the Convention adjourned sine die.

LIBERIA HERALD.

MONROVIA WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 4. 1857

Export Duty Bill.

The Legislature during its Session from the present emergencies of the Government, saw the necessity of enacting an Export Duty Bill. We know at the present age, that the policy of the world is to simplify as much as possible commercial communication upon principles of free trade; but in the present exigencies of the government, it was found necessary by the Legislature for the purpose of raising the Revenue, to pass the bill refered to. It might appear to some minds, that in the passage of such a bill, there was a sinister motives in view, at all events, a motive to speculate by indirect means upon foreign commerce. If such should be the views of any, we beg to disabuse their minds of the impression. For several years past, the government has labored under very embarrassing circumstances occasioned by the repeated incendiary outbreakes of the aboriginal tribes upon defenceless settlements, which demanded a large expenditure of the government Revenue to bring about a reconciliation of matters, as well, as a great loss of individual property, that in many instances, the government had for the benefit of the sufferers, to make large appropriations. So constant a draw upon the Public Treasury occasioned by these untoward circumstances, as well as the necessary means requisite to carry on the government, have caused the present embarrassment of its finances.

Since the existence of treaties between the several European powers and this government, their subjects, traders upon our coast, have demeaned themselves pretty honorably, and the few instances of difference (if they may be so called) have always been satisfactorily adjusted upon the least complaint to their representatives. We must in justice to merited honor say, that Her Britannic Majesty's Consul, J. G. C. L. Newnham Esq. has without dissimulation acted worthy of his office, and the confidence of this government, in requiring on the part of Her Majesty's subjects a due respect for our Revenue laws.—Also J. Z. Forney Esq. U. S. Commercial Agent, whose conduct has been commendatory as a foreign functionary accredited near this government. The genteel manners of the gentlemen spoken of, have gained for them the esteem of the citizens of this community. It is gratifying to us when we can pay that meed to foreign functionaries in our midst without flattery or ambiguity. We feel assured to say, that should respect on the one part, and attention on the other part by the executors be paid to the law, that the government will in the course of a year or two be so far rid of its present embarrassment, as to see no necessity of continuing it in force.

INCENDIARY MOVEMENTS. From authentic intelligence, we learn that Bombo the notorious Vey Chief captured and imprisoned for a time in this city in 1853, since his escape, has taken up his abode in the Barlain country and has established an order of Gree-gree worship called Mamma, (honor of their ancestors) by which means he is endeavoring to consolidate the interest of every tribe, making common cause of every matter. We are sorry to say, that up to the present date of our information, he has already succeeded too well. This coalition in our opinion, has a specific object, and it is well for us to be on the look out. The character of this gree gree is taking pretty rapidly with the several tribes in this county; natives estranged to the Barlain dialect, are going out constantly to be initiated into the secrecies of this mysterious god of Bombo's creation. The superstition of the natives is very easily awakened, and any thing calculated to excite their cupidity, set on foot by such a known character as Bombo, cannot fail to take well, especially, when pains are taken to get up a foolish pageant ceremony at which a bull or two are slaughtered, or a human victim offered to establish its character. Thousands on thousands will be proselyted to the creed of this defender of ancestral rights, who will be implacable in their enmity to every opposing principle. We cannot say positively, what object Bombo has in view; but we fear his purpose is to attack some of our settlements, and it is well in case our suspicions be properly founded, to be prepared to give him a warm reception. The natives in Sinoe county still assume a hostile attitude; but the interdict which has been ordered to be continued on the coast, if rigidly enforced, will no doubt, work a better result than arms.

THE COMING ELECTION. At the Whig Convention which met in this city on the evening of the 30th ult., President Benson was unanimously nominated for the Presidency and Genl. J. N. Lewis for the Vice Presidency. This demonstration of the Whig party for the man against whom they contended so warmly at the biennial election in 1854 foretells in our opinion good results. We are certain of one fact, that the man whom they apparently so much feared, has proved himself so far as we can judge from public opinion, not only worthy of the further confidence and suffrages of the party through whose influence he was elected to the Presidency in 1855, but his opposers have seen the necessity of choosing him on their ticket also; and we heartily commend them for their liberality of sentiment. We advocate no principle of partyism further than the immediate interest of the country demands, and we feel it our duty as far as our ability will allow to look well to it. President Benson certainly has done well. During the short time he has been in office, he has evidenced the fact, that he is the people's President. The True Liberian Convention which will meet on the evening of the 6th inst., we are advised, will again bring President Benson and Vice President Yates before the people with their former confidence. The union of the present political feeling in all but one instance, marks the good sense so far of the people; and we trust that every citizen will use his influence to the end, that partyism in a great measure, if continued, will be deprived of much of its latent rancor.

We respectfully invite the attention of our Liberian readers to an article headed "Extension of African Trade" on our 4th page written by William Coppinger Esq., Treas., of the Penn., Col. Society, a friend of the colored race in general, and an indefatgable friend and well-wisher of the prosperity of Liberia. The article refered to gives a very effictent summary of the importance of the African trade, and the great advantage derived by British merchants over the American, by their system of operations. The desideratum truly is great. The product of the trade on the Liberian coast to European traders alone, cannot be less than $500, 000 per annum, and this calculation we believe to be greatly underrated. The indigenous products of the country are many, and the prolific character of the soil is calculated to produce in abundance, cotton, sugar, cane and coffee of the finest quality. The palm, seemingly, from its rapid growth and abundant production, was designed to be a never failing article of African Commerce—one tree often yielding ten gallons of oil. Had the American feeling, and mercantile system toward Liberia been otherwise, the great flow of Commerce that proceeds from every river and harbor of Liberia into the hands of British merchants, would have long since centered in her, and the Liberian trade alone ere this period would have been of a million dollars advantages to American Commerce annually. The present mercantile policy between the British and the *L*iberian merchants, we doubt not but in a short time will conduce abundantly more advantageously to the increase of the Revenue of the government.

The treaties entered into between us and the several European powers, engages respect to our laws, unites our common interest in association and guarantee to us, a reciprocal equality of rights, privileges and immunities. The facilities afforded by the British line of steamers have brought us close together, and every month we are apprised of the rise or fall of produce in the English markets, enabling our merchants to order their arrangements accordingly, and to import such goods as will command ready sale. The rate of the Liberian trade proper, is not given definitely by Mr. Coppinger for want we suppose of reliable statistics. We feel grateful for his kindness in bringing this important subject so ably before the American Commercial public; and we trust in another number or two of our paper, we shall be able to furnish him and our readers generally, with an authenticated statistical account of Liberian Commerce.

CAPE PALMAS. We regret to learn that the difficulties which took place in Cape Palmas December last between the Colonists and the natives, and resulted in the complete routing of the latter, have been revived through some inadvertency, in the successful party.

From what we can glean, it appears that the colonists having been successful in several skirmishes twenty-six of their number manned a large canoe and ascended the lake to attack a town near by, were fired upon, and three of them killed. In firing a small piece of ordnance which they had in the canoe in return, it appears the canoe was split nearly in two from the sudden jar of the cannon which sunk, and the remaining twentythree men were drowned. Upon this sudden disaster, in the face of the enemy, they became emboldened, and their menaces have been more threatening and fearful. The Government we learn, will take speedy measures to afford the State of Maryland relief.

POET'S DEPARTMENT.

From the Star Gourn sey

THE VOICE OF THE FALLING LEAVES.

A friendless minstrel walked alone,
Where the autumn twilight lay,
Cold on the woods and leaves were strewn
By thousands in his way;
He thought of the promise-breathing spring,
And of summer's rosy eves,
And he said—"Alas, for the withering
And the time of falling leaves."

The music of birds and breeze had passed
From the woodlands hushed and dim;
But there came an answering voice at last
From the dying leaves to him;
And it said—"Oh, thou of the sleepless thought
In thy musings sad and lone,
Weep not the close of our tearless lot,
But rather mourn thine own."

"For the greenness of early spring was ours,
And the summer's palmy prime,
And the glowing tints that decked the bowers
In the glorious harvest time;
And have not we seen the roses die?
For their splendours might not stay,
And the summer birds are gone, then why
Should not leaves too pass away?

"Yet the flowers may fade, the leaves may fall,
And the glory of woods, depart,
But mourn in thy sorrow, more than all,
The withering of the heart;
And the soul's young brightness dim'ed so soon
'Twas a glory early o'er
For time hath taken that blessed boon,
But time can ne'er restore.—

"And mourn for life's perished hopes that died
While the spring was flowery still,
For the stainless love which the grave hath hid,
Though it could not change or chill,
For the weary eyes that have looked for ligh
Which never met their gaze,
And for all who have lived through storm and blight
But saw no summer days."

The winds in their lonely power awoke,
As the night came darkly on,
And the voice which in twilight stillness spoke
With that twilight hour was gone,
"And oh," said the minstrel, "strange, in sooth
Are the spells which fancy weaves,
For now she hath given a voice of truth
To the fading, falling leaves."

HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

HOW TO SECURE THEM.

The tenderest care, the utmost solicitude, which we can bestow upon woman in seasons of sickness, are but a light payment of the debt we owe her—a debt contracted in our cradles, and constantly accumulating until we die. No man has more faithfully discharged that debt than the great English physician Professor Holloway. His remedies have probably done more to relieve the various diseases especially incident to the sex, than all the potions and external applications with which medical practitioners have afflicted them since the commencement of the Christian era. Drastic aperients, pernicious stimulants, and poisonous lotions and emulsions, have ruined the constitutions and blighted the lovliness of thousands of the gentler sex; but we trust that the day when the lives of those who are dearest to us could thus be trifled with is past. At length wives and mothers begin to understand the danger of being subjected to such treatment. The mild, soothing and restorative influence of Holloway's great internal and external remedies, in all the complaints to which woman is subject, are now generally admited. They have been administered with marked and unvarying success in those disturbances of the system which occur in the various stages of adolescence, during the season of maternity, and at a later period of life. Every disorder, bodily and mental, incident to this sequence, seems to be relieved and modified by the gentle and purifying effect of Holloway,s Pills.

We should not venture, in a matter of such vast importance, to hazard an opinion on questionable grounds; but we cannot hesitate to believe the testimony which has been placed before us. Ladies of the highest respectability, rightly thinking that squeamishness is out of place where health and life are concerned, have certified to the efficacy of the remedies in nearly all the complaints to which the sex is liable, and have recommended them in the strongest terms as preservatives of that external beauty which depends upon health, as well as of health itself.

If it be true—and who so insensate as to doubt it?—that

"The world was sad, the gardon was a wild,
And man, the nermit, sighed till woman smiled," surely it behoves us to point out and urge upon her attention the means of relieving her sufferings and turning her sadness into joy.—New York Herald.

For the Liberia Herald.

Mr Herald,

It is somewhat gratifying to Elijah Johnson that the thoughts he threw together on "Protective duties" &c. has brought to our Public Library, at least one work on Political Economy. Elijah Johnson had never read such a work, neither was he an adept in the kind of writing he attempted. The idea was to "try," yes "try," to set down on paper what he thought he had long witnessed as acting to the injury of Liberia as a New Republic of strugling people.

Still it strikes me, that there is, in the annals of political economy, such a subject as "Protective Tariff," which has in view the specific purpose of nurturing, and encouraging home industry and economy. Elijah Johnson had not had the privilege of seeing into F. K. Bastiat's "little book," and would very much like to own the production of a French, or any other "political economist" so highly approved by an English statition and economist as G. Porter, himself, al so a distinguished author. This is to many no doubt authority enough. But should E. J. ever see this work refered to, he feels confident that the good common sense of the writers patriotism would cause him to demur against seeing his own country wholy in the hands of strangers in a commercial light, without a due consideration. or proper remuneration; so would both F. K. Bastiat and G. Porter. protest against seeing both England and France as Liberia is in fact, reduced to the condition of a standing army—by an indirect impressment, and that without pay—but to guard at their own expense, at the risque of their very existences very often except, insurrection raised, is pay, and insurrection suppressed is profit. insurrection too raised by the false managers of transient trading strangers, to be surpressed by the people they visit, when at the same time, that trade militates in my humble opinion, against their whole interest as a nation and as a people in many respects.

Is not the trade of Liberia now almost wholy in the hands of foreigners? Furthermore, is it not so in the hands of foreigners, that it is of but little benefit to us? Have they not a system, matured and strengthened. as an iron chain that can hardly be bent or broken, which gives those foreigners whose love for our prosperity and political possession is the love of satan for a saint? And are not these undue influences wrong, and often distructive, in its impression upon all points of our coast? Power once gained, backed by money which is also power and influence, is not so easily removed by weakness, in want of Power, unless we as the just rulers of this soil, fall back upon a power, outside of trading and monitory influences, to gather breathing, privilege, and elbow room. I agree with Elijah Johnson, that a foreign system of trade governing us. keeping us in necessitous circumstances, which lessons not the price of foreign shoes, but which makes them to us one hundred per cent dearer. If it made our shoes sure to us at $2, and thus saved us from paying $3, we could not complain so much; but the foreign system so kills off the native manufactor, who might if protected sell at $1,50 and keeps the shoes at $3,00 thus taxing us $1.50 on each pair, by this system of extortion, which power and money gives their system, the power to keep, operating crushingly upon us. No F. K. Bastiat. or G. Porter, would go for this for England or France; the book will take ground no doubt, for justice in trade, and protection at home. Therefore the fallacy rests in the reasoning from premises in England and France, and not in Liberia; he knows not that the price comes down just long enough to kill off the poor shoe maker and taylor, and then runs up to two three, and five hundred per cent. The bate acts upon our mechanics as nunx vomica upon the wolf; it kills them and sends them off their benches and counters, so as to give foreigners room to extort, in any way they see fit, and the way they do see fit to act is like the Turk in power, acted by the powerless Jew. The spirit is "bleed him." "life is sweet, and all that a man has will he give for his life," food, raiment, and shoes, are life! the foreigner, by his system has gained this life, and we pay dearly for it. Liberia is as an ass couched between two burthens, and unable to rise without protection; on one side is destruction of home manufacture, for purposes of extortion, and on the other necessity, brought on by this system of foreign extortion.

We must complain, while the foreign merchant brings a ready made article; it may be shoes or some other garment; our manufactures are poor, they are not rich capitalists, they are strugling for an existence, and manufacturing footing; and the system that sell them leather very high to manufacture, on one hand, and sells shoes on the other a little lower than our manufacturers can sell them, until, and only until they are impoverished and killed off, and then up goes the price of shoes, or any other garment, to prices, one, two, and three hundred per cent above. what Liberian consumers could be furnished at home, by a course of steady protection. The mistake of Dr Hodgkins—and his writers on Political Economy lays, in not knowing the workings of this curious African transient trading system by Foreigners. They ought to have wrote in Africa, and not in nations with power to repell agression, or with manufacturing skill, wealth and ability to come, without protection of Law, against foreign importation by what might be manufactured at home.

This Mr. Herald is our own native opinion, arising from what we see, and feel, and see clearly—and feel keenly—It was our opinion without ever reading the deductions of any foreign political economist.

Neither did the writer expect that any one who lived by this system of Foreign oppression or by one kindred to it, would agree with him, because where power is obtained, that power unless converted by a patiotism not always found in those who have the advantage, will operate vigorously against opponents. Now Mr Herald, it was never expected that the views of Elijah Johnson were all correct, or that Liberia was ready for all he said; the design of the writer was simply to call attention to the points, and to make inquiry, and to stir up Liberia to make ready—to get herself into a state of readiness—to stand upon her own feet—to look at her own interest, and to her own future independence for which she has struggled so lustily,—fought so bravely, and to use the right to rule, which she has purchased so honestly from the aboriginees, the sons our Fathers.

Most Respectfully
DANIEL HAWKINS.

EXTENSION OF AFRICAN TRADE.

For years past we have urged the importance of a greater degree of attention being paid to the trade with Africa. The various reports of coasting and inland travellers—the great increase in palm-oil and other legitimate articles of commerce—the mineral discoveries in the South and West—the fruitful lands and dense population in the interior recently visited by intelligent explorers—all show how essential to our interests is the interchange of products with the natives of Africa.

From the Colonization Herald, we learn that a deputation, comprising many of the well known friends of Africa, recently had the opportunity of an hour's conference with Lord Palmerston during which such facilitieswere sought for as would open up that mighty continent to lawful commerce. The points submitted, and in which the co-operation of the government was sought, many be thus briefly stated: that Sierra Leone should be made a free port, in being the only good harbor upon a coast line of at least two thousand miles; that the use of Fernando Po, or some other suitable locality near the Equator, should be secured by treaties for British merchants; that the naval commander of the West African squadron should be instructed to send a small steamer up the Niger to the confluence each season, for a few years to come, in order to give confidence, security and encouragement to settlers and traders; and that a small steamer should be placed on the river or lagoon upon which Lagos is situated, so as to have a control over the slave boats emerging from the contiguous waters.

Mr. Macgregor Laird, the pioneer and advocate of the exploration, extended commerce, and postal communication with Western Africa, furnished Lord Palmerston with some practical information. He stated that, with its various commercial advantages of situation and splendid harbor, if the custom house charges were removed and the port made free, Sierra Leone would become a great entre port for the whole coast from the Gâmbia to Cape Palmas, and that the French, American and other traders would resort to it. Monthly steam communication is already extended from Plymouth and Liverpool to Fernando Po, and this intercourse will tend, as it has already done, to increase trade with the interior. London, Bristol and other houses in the African trade load many a ship in the year at the Bight of Benin; but the extension of civilization, and intelligence, and experience, into the interior, by the channels of the large rivers, would do much to promote commerce, and greatly hasten the dispatch of cargoes of country produce to the coast.

There can be no question that vast commercial advantages would accrue to the commerce of western Africa, if the Niger and Tschadda, the natural highways into the interior to Timbuctoo and other large cities of the continent, were effectually opened and maintained for a few years. The last expedition is a proof that, under judicious management, and at the proper season, there is no greater danger to health, in a navigation of those streams, than of other rivers in Brazil and our southern States. While the British export trade with different parts of the world has only increased in the last twenty years fifty per cent., the export trade to Western Africa has more than doubled. British manufactures are mainly dependant on that quarter for several articles, especially vegetable oils and ivory. The yearly export of palm oil has risen to the value of nearly two millions pounds sterling, or ten millions of dollars. Ground nuts, for oil, are a leading article of production. Dyewoods are important. Of the whole imports of ivory into Great Britain, Africa supplies one-half. When it is noticed what has been done in stimulating the cultivation of coffee, sugar, spices, and other staples in Liberia, there is no reason why a great stimulus may not be given also to the countries bordering on the rivers of the interior.

The following returns to Parliament illustrate the increase of British exports to the West Coast of Africa, and of imports from the same region:

	Exports.	Imports.	Totals.
1850,	£639,429	£605,958	£1,245,387
1851,	654,543	794,810	1,449,353
1852,	533.725	707,024	1,240,749
1853,	901,402	749,373	1,659,775
1854,	958,809	905,634	1,864,443

This is independent of the British colonies of Sierra Leone, the trade of which amounted in 1854, to $1, 421,865, and of the British possessions on the Gold Coast and the River Gambia, amounting to $1 547, 285 more, and of those at the Cape of Good Hope and in South Africa, swelling the amount $8,383, 000 more; making in all an aggregate of over $23, 000,000 in 1854, for the Western Coast of Africa entire.

The following table shows the trade of the United States with Africa during the seven years ending 3rd June, 1855:

	Exports.	Imports.	Totals.
1849,	$708,411	$495.742	$1,204,153
1850,	759,266	524,722	1,283,988
1851,	1,340,644	1,163.176	2,503 820
1852,	1,246,141	1,057,657	2,303,798
1853,	1 610 833	1,202,986	2,813,809
1854,	1,804 972	1,388,560	3,193,532
1855,	1,375,905	1,337,527	2,713,432

Thus it will be seen that the trade between the United States and the whole of Africa is most insignificant in comparison with that between England and simply the Western Coast. With reference to Liberia the startling fact is that, while the importations from England are increasing, from the United States they are diminishing.

This is but the legitimate result of British and American policy illustrated. In the trying days of the Republic of Liberia, Great Britain promptly threw around her the shield of sympathy and protection. She also liberally aided the young nation in various ways, by giving her the nucleus of a navy' and by other acts of kindness. On the other hand, our government has absolutly done nothing, while our revenue laws operate unfavorably, and tend materially to check commercial intercourse. Thus most, if not all, the principal products of Africa are admitted free of duty into England, but in our country the tariff demands a duty on ivory, baswood, and camwood, of five per cent, palm oil ten per cent, gum copal and ebony twenty per cent. These articles enter largely into the process of manufactures, so that the imposition of a tariff can afford no encouragement to home industry in the United States, while its effect must be to force the articles to a market where they will be more willingly received, and yield a handsome return to the merchant and trafficker. Let our government, without unnecessary delay, acknowledge the independence of Liberia, as the powers of Europe have long since done, and our national Congress legislate so as to encourage, and not ignore a trade promising the largest results.

An American steam line to Africa would be a pioneer of civilization. It would afford a rapid communication with the interesting republic of Liberia, which is proving the capacity of the Christianized and Americanized African for self-government, according to Anglo Saxon ideas and institutions. It could not fail to promote powerfully the prosperity of that young Commonwealth It would practically bridge the Atlantic in a new direction, and connect together the most progressive and the most stationary of the continents. It would soon be an effectual aid in that African exodus from the soil of the New World to the ancient fatherlands of the race, of which we now see the faint beginnings. Its realization would involve more wide reaching and beneficial results than even its warmest friends have ever hoped. [Wm. Cur nor.]

Holloway's Ointment and Pills, certain Remedies for Rheumatism.—Henry Foot, aged 52, of St. Vincents, was a severe sufferer from this complaint, and tried a number of reputed remedies, hoping they would benefit him, but he became so bad at last, as to be entirely confined to his bed, and he was unable to move either hand or foot. While he was in this horrible condition, a friend brought him a quantity of Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which he immediately commenced to use, he soon found himself gradually improved by them, and by persevering with them for eleven weeks, he was entirely cured, and has since enjoyed the best health.

HY HEART AND HOPE.

The wide, the deep, the flowing sea
Contains a wealthy store;
Its ebb is strong, its flow is free,
Its billows fear no power.
Though storms may lash its briny waves,
They soon are lull'd asleep,
And not a foaming breaker raves
Across the silent deep.

My heart, my heart is like the sea,
A changing, flowing thing:
It sometimes rages loud and free,
When love its calm will bring.
The gales of passion soon subside,
The heart at rest appears:
The heart, which late to peace denied,
Her silent smoothness wears.

My hope, my hope is but a bark
Upon my heart's deep sea.
Sometimes 'tis toss'd 'midst tempests dark,
Sometimes at rest 'twill be.
The sea will change, the storms will rage,
And o'er its boundless scope
Be toss'd the bark, as battles wage;—
Such is my heart and hope.

NO SUCH WORD AS FAIL!

A RESISTLESS REMEDY.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

Circular to the Sick.

The first hospital surgeons and medical publicists of Europe, admit the unparalleled anti-inflammatory and healing properties of this Ointment; governments sanction its use in their naval and military services; and the masses in this country and throughout the world repose the utmost confidence in its curative properties. It penetrates the sources of inflammation and corruption which underlie the external evidences of disease, and nutralize the fiery elements which feed and exasperate the malada.

Rhuematism, Scrofula, Erysipelas.

These are among the most terrible and agonizing diseases, yet in their worst forms, and when seemingly incurable, they invariably disappear under a persevering application of this soothing, healing, antidote to pain and inflammation.

King's Evil, Fever Sores, Stiff Joints.

In cases of King's Evil where medicinal waters, lotions, and every recipe of the pharmacopœia have proved useless, the Ointment will accomplish a thorough cure. Fever Sores heal quickly under its influence, and its relaxing effect upon contracted sinews is truly wonderful.

Discharging Ulcers.

A most remarkable and happy change is produced in the appearance of malignant ulcers, after a few applications of this Ointment. The surrounding redness vanishes, and granules of healthy flesh begin to take the place of the discharged matter. This process goes on more or less rapidly, until the orifice is filled up with sound material and the ulcer radically cured.

A Word to Mothers.

The young are the most frequent sufferers from external injuries and therefore every mother should have this healing preparation constantly at hand. It is an absolute specific for sore breasts, and quickly removes the encrusted sores which sometimes disfigure the heads and faces of children.

Significant Facts.

This Ointment is universally used on board the Atlantic and pacific whaling fleet as a cure for scorbutic affections and as the best possible remedy for wounds and bruises. Large supplies of it have recently been ordered by the Sultan of Turkey for hospital purposes.

Ulcers, Sores, and Tumors.

The effect of this unrivalled external remedy upon Scrofula, and other virulent ulcers and sores, is almost miraculous. It first discharges the poison which produces suppuration and proud flesh, and thus the cures which its healing properties afterwards complete are safe as well as permanent.

Wounds, Bruises, Burns and Scalds.

In cases of the fracture of the bone, injuries caused by steam explosions, Bruises Burns, Scalds, Rheumatism, Stiffness of the Joints, and contraction of the sinews, it is employed and warmly recommended by the faculty. This marvellous remedy has been introduced by its inventor in person into all the leading Hopitals of Europe, and no private household should be without it.

Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the following cases:—

Bad Legs	Chiego-foot	Fistulas	Sore-throats
Bad Breasts	Chilblains	Gout	Skin-diseases
Burns	Chapped hands	Glandular Swellings	Scurvy
Bunions	Corns (Soft)	Lumbago	Sore-heads
Bite of Moschetoes and Sand-Flies	Cancers	Piles	Tumours
	Contracted and Stiff Joints	Rheumatism	Ulcers
		Scalds	Wounds
Coco-bay	Elephantiasis	Sore Nipples	Yaws

Sold at the Establishments of PROFESSOR HOLLOWAY, 244, Strand, (near Temple Bar,) London, and 80, Maiden Lane, New York, also by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicines throughout the evilized world; at the following prices:—1s 3d., 3s. 3d., and 5s. each Pot.

Febuary 20th 1857,

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

The whole machinery employed to conduct the business arising out of our foreign relations with all the powers of the world is far more simple than is generally conceived. The number employed in the Department of State of the United States is only seventeen, as follows: One Secretary of State, (Hon. William L. Marcy,) one Assistant Secretary of State, (William Hunter,) one chief clerk, twelve clerks, one translator, and one librarian.

Diplomatic Branch.—This branch of the State Department has charge of all correspondence between the department and other diplomatic agents of the United States abroad, and those of foreign powers accredited to this government. In it all diplomatic instructions sent from the department, and communications to commissioners under treaties of boundaries, &c., are prepared, copied, and recorded; and all of lite character received are registered and filed, their contents being first entered in an analytic table or index.

Consular Branch.— This branch has charge of the correspondence, &c., between the department and the consuls and commercial agents of the United States. In it instructions to those officers, and answers to their despatches and to letters from other persons asking for consular agency, or relating to consular affairs, are prepared and recorded.

The Disbursing Agent—He has charge of all correspondence and other matters connected with accounts relating to any fund with the disbursement of which the department is charged.

The Translator.—His duties are to furnish such translations as the department may require. He also records the commissions of consuls and vice consuls, when not in English, upon which exequaturs are issued.

Clerk of Appointments and Commissions.—He makes out and records commissions, letters of appointments and nominations to the Senate; makes out and records exequaturs, and records when in English, the commissions on which they are issued. Has charge of the library.

Clerk of the Rolls and Archives.—He takes charge of the rolls, or enrolled acts and resolutions of Congress, as they are received at the department from the President; prepares the authenticated copies thereof which are called for; prepares for, and superintends their publication, and that of treaties, in the newspapers and in book form; attends to their distribution throughout the United States, and that of all documents and publications in regard to which, this duty is assigned to the department; writing and answering all letters connected therewith. Has charge of all Indian treaties, and business relating thereto.

Clerk of Authentications and Copyrights.—He has charge of the seals of the United State and of the department, and prepares and attaches certificates to papers presented for authentication; receives and accounts for the fees. Has charge of publications transmitted to the department under the laws relating to copyrights; records and indexes their titles; records all letters from the department, other than the diplomatic and consular.

Clerk of pardons and Passports.—He prepares and records pardons and remissions; and registers and files the petitions and papers on which they are founded, Makes out and records passports; keeps a daily register of all letters, other than diplomatic and consular, received, and of the disposition made of them; prepares letters relating to this business.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Hon. Caleb Cushing, Attorney General of the United States; R. H. Gillet, esq., chief clerk. The ordinary business of this office may be classified under the following heads:

1. Official opinions on the current business of the government, as called for by the President, by any head of department, or by the Solicitor of the Treasury.

2. Examination of the titles of all land purchased, as the sites of arsenals, custom-houses light-houses, and all other public works of the United States.

3. Applications for pardons in all cases of conviction in the courts of the United States.

4. Applications for appointment in all the judicial and legal business of the government.

5. The conduct and argument of all suits in the Supreme Court of the United States in which the government is concerned.

6. The supervision of all other suits arising in any of the departments when referred by the head thereof to the Attorney General.

To these ordinary heads of the business of the office are added at the present time the following, viz:

First. The direction of all appeals on land claims in California,

Second. The codification and revision of laws of the District of Columbia.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Secretary of the Interior Department, Hon. Robert McClelland, of the State of Michigan. Its clerical force consists of one chief clerk, (George C. Whiting, esq.,) one disbursing agent, and ten other regular clerks; and to its supervision and management are committed the following branches of the public service:

1st. The public lands.—The cheif of this bureau is called the "Commissioner of the General Land Office." The Land Bureau is charged with the survey, management, and sale of the public domain, and the issuing of titles thereof, whether derived from confirmations of grants made by former governments, by sales, donations, of grants for schools, military bounties, or public improvements, and likewise the revision of Virginia military bounty land claims, and the issuing of scrip in lieu thereof. The Land Office, also, audits its own accounts. The present Commissioner is Hon. T. H. Hendricks, of Indiana. Its principal officers are a recorder, cheif or principal clerk of public lands, principal clerk of private land claims, and principal clerk of surveys—all of whom are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate—besides a draughtsman, assistant draughtsman, and some 106 clerks of various grades.

2. Pensions.—The present head of this bureau is the Hon. Josiah Minot, of New Hampshire. The Commissioner is charged with the examination and adjudication of all claims arising under the various and numerous laws passed by Congress granting bounty land or pensions for military or naval services in the revolutionary and subsequent wars in which the United States have been engaged. He has one chief clerk, (S. Cole, esq.,) and a permanent corps consisting of some seventy other clerks, to which Congress to enable him to meet the extraordinary requirements of the new bounty land law, has added a temporary force of about fifty clerkships of different denominations.

3d. Indians.—Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Hon. George W. Manypenny, of Ohio. He is provided with a cheif clerk and about fifteen other subordinate clerks.

4th. Patent Office.—To this bureau is committed the execution and performance of all "acts and things touching and respecting the granting and issuing of patents for new and useful discoveries, inventions, and improvements," the collection of statistics relating to agriculture; the collection and distribution of seeds, plants and cuttings. It has a chief clerk—who is by law (as at the present time) the Acting Commissioner of Patents in the absence of the Commissioner—ten principal and ten assistant examiners of patents, besides some dozen other subordinate permanent clerks.

Besides these four principal branches of this new executive department, the organic act of 1849 transferred to it from the Treasury Department the supervision of the accounts of the United States marshals and attorneys, and the clerks of the United States courts; the management of the lead and other mines of the United States, and the affairs of the penitentiary of the United States in the District of Columbia; and from the State Department the duty of taking and returning the censuses of the United States, and of supervising and directing the acts of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. By recent acts of Congress, also, the hospital for the insane of the army and navy of the District of Columbia is under the management of this department; and by assignment from the President, it has added to its long list of duties the survey and demarcation of the unsettled boundary lines between the States and Territories and bordering nations.

This department is at present very inconvenpently separated and located, and should be appropriately and permanently provided for. The Patent Office building the General Land Office a portion of the Treasury building, and the Pension Office a portion of "Winder's building," now the property of the government, whilst the Indian Office is located in premises not fire-proof, and rented of their private owners.

(To be continued.)

LAWS ENACTED BY THE LEGISLATURE DURING ITS SESSION AND PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY.

An act providing for a national Fair.

Whereas it is deemed expedient, for the encouragement of Agriculture and other useful arts, that a National Fair be held in the government square in the city of Monrovia, in the month of December 1857, (second Monday,) Therefore,—

It is Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled,—

Sec. 1. That there shall be a National Fair held in the public square of the city of Monrovia commencing on the the fourteenth day of the month of December, 1857.

Sec. 2. That any article or articles of Agriculture, Manufacture, or Art, showing forth the skill, industry and ingenuity of the citizens of this Republic, or the aborigines of the country, any animal or animals raised, may be exhibited and sold at said national fair.

Sec. 3. The President of this Republic shall appoint a committee of five men, to be called a Committee of Inspection, whose duty it shall be to judge of the relative values of articles of the same kind; as the best made sugar, syrup, or molasses, also the best cleansed coffee, or any other article of agriculture and manufacture, extending the same principle of examination to articles of wood, stone, &c, &c, also to cattle, swine, sheep, goats, poultry, &c, judging the order, quality, size, &c, of said animals. The said Committee may also inspect single articles, as machinery furniture, &c. setting forth extraordinary skill and craft in workmanship, as the case may be; and upon the report of said committee, the President of this Republic shall award premiums as follows:

To the producer of the best article of Cotton, not less than ten pounds, raised by a Liberian, ten dollars.	$	10,00
To the producer of the best Syrup, not less than twenty gallons, seven dollars,	"	7,00

An act providing for the relief of the State of Maryland in Liberia.

Whereas the cause of Truth, Humanity and Religion, requires the extension and perpetuity of the Christian Settlements that have under direction of Divine Providence been formed on the Western Coast of Africa, which settlements we believe are designed by Heaven to be the honored instruments of effecting the evangelization, and civilization of this benighted Continent. And whereas our sister state Maryland in Liberia is in a most perilous condition in consequence of the sad realities of an unsuccessful warfare against fearful odds! Their small number has been greatly reduced, their means of defense are very limited and their ordinary supplies cut off to a great extent, and their savage foes by late disasters attending the Americo Liberian arms are greatly emboldened, and with their overwhelming numbers may fall upon that infant State and, destroy it. And as the people of the state of Maryland in their extremity has appealed to the Republic of Liberia; for assistance; Therefore,—

In the name of humanity, of Religion, and of our God, though embarrassed by recent difficulties ourselves, we feel willing to extend the helping hand, and rely upon Jehovah, and the friends of humanity to sustain us in our feeble efforts to avert the blow aimed to destroy our sister State; therefore,—

It is Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled,—

Sec: 1st. That the President be, and he is hereby authorized and requested for the relief of the State of Maryland in Liberia, to adopt measures for the formation of an allied military force offensive and defensive, of volunteers in this Republic to assist the State of Maryland in Liberia to settle the difficulties subsisting between that State and those of the aboriginal inhabitants who are hostile within its jurisdiction The officers of said Volunteer Army shall be approved of and commissioned by the President, and shall be governed by the militia laws and Regulations of the Republic of Liberia. Each volunteer of said military corps, shall be also entitled to two months payment in advance and a premium of one town lot and one hundred acres of farm land, and shall be required to continue until the cessation of hostilities.

Sec: 2nd. It is also Resolved that the President is further authorized and directed to assume the expenses and payment of the Forces provided for by the 1st Section of this Resolution, and to endorse for the State of Maryland in Liberia, or borrow on the credit of this Government any amount of money, not exceeding ten thousand dollars for the safety and security of Maryland in Liberia, and to inform the Government of the State of Maryland in Liberia, that the Republic of Liberia has tendered the aid required by that Government by means of money borrowed by the Republic of Liberia for the specific purpose, in good faith, in behalf of the State of Maryland in Liberia, and requires, the government of the State of Maryland in Liberia to re-imburse the government of the Republic of Liberia for all expenditure incurred by the Republic for the relief of the State of Maryland in Liberia.

Sec: 3rd. It is Resolved, That the President is further authorized and directed to forward to the State of Maryland in Liberia in addition to the outfit of military equipments and munitions of war furnished the allied forces of this Government for the State of Maryland in Liberia, the following muntions of war viz:—

200 Round Shot.
200 Pounds of Buck Shot,
10 Barrels of Powder,
500 lbs Lead,
75 Muskets.

Sec: 4th. That in order to render efficient aid and assistance to the State of Maryland in Liberia and to continue the friendly feelings that exist bewteen the two nations, a Minister be delegated from this Government to the State of Maryland in Liberia with full instructions from the President.

Sec: 5th. That the President is authorized and requested to establish Postal arrangements between the two Governments to continue during the continuance of hostilities; and to employ an armed vessel of this Government as far as circumstances will admit, to assist and strengthen the State of Maryland in Liberia.

A supplementary act, to an act, entitled an act concerning elections to punish the offenders and prevent frauds and foreign interference in elections.

Whereas the present statute law on elections, now in force, is insufficient to prevent a system of foreign intermeddling; and whereas, if it be not timely checked, the end sought by holding elections, will be irretrivably lost to all Liberians, therefore,—

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled.

Sect: 6th That any and all foreigners who are, or may be within, about the shores or within the boundaries of this Republic, shall not intermeddle with Liberian elections, by the use of money, or by the use of any consideration whatever, which can be estimated or valued; such as provisions, wages, employment, credits, or threats of dismission from service, or menaces to with-hold any consideration, which would lead the employee to renounce his independence and the like.

Sect: 7th It is further enacted, That neither foreigner, nor any other, putting himself in a foreigner's place, shall be guilty of any of the offences contained in the 6th Sec: without incurring the following penalties. For the first offense, he, she or they, singly, shall forfeit and pay not less than $200,00 and for every succeeding offense the sum of $200, 00 shall be added.

Sect: 8th, It is further enacted, That any offences of the kind having been determined against the offenders, and verdict and judgment having been rendered, in any and every case against him her or them, the proceeds of executions collected by the Sheriff, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the county where the offense shall have been tried, and the Sheriff shall take the Treasurer's receipt for the same.

Sect: 9th, It is further enacted, that the Sheriff shall obtain 5 per centum for executing on the judgment of the court and paying the money to the Treasurer.

Sect: 10th, The Treasurer shall give one half of the election penalties to the informant or informants, being certified such by the signature of the judge, which certificate being endorsed by the informant or informants, name, shall be held by the Treasurer, as his voucher; all costs having been paid before any division shall take place, and receipts held for them by the Treasurer.

Sec: 11. It is further enacted, that the treasurer of the County in which the election penalties shall have been determined,—execution having been issued on judgment, and money having been deposited—shall pay out by order of the President, the other half of the money or moneys mentioned in the building a poor house in the largest incorporated city of the County.

Sect: 12th, The President is hereby authorized and requested to draw from the Treasury the aforementioned amount for the above mentioned purpose.

Sect: 13th, All laws ordinances and regulations, repugnant to this Act shall be, and they are hereby repealed.

An act regulating the intercourse of foreigners, and limiting certain officers.

It is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Liberia in Legislature assembled,

sec. 1st, That from and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any foreigner or foreigners to sell, or barter any goods, merchandize, or vendible property, or transact any commercial business in any port of the Republic of Liberia except by the intervention of a Liberian broker or commission merchant; or unless such rights and privileges are granted to them by treaty stipulations.

Sec, 2d, It is further Enacted, that if any foreigner or foreigners be found guilty of violating the provisions of this act, he or they shall, on conviction before the Court of Pleas and quarter session, be fined in any sum.—not less than five hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars for the first offense; And for the second,—not more than two thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars at the discretion of the Court. And in default of payment of such fine, with all costs and charges, he or they shall be imprisoned for a period, not to exceed eighteen calendar months, or until such fine, with all costs and charges shall have been paid.

Sec, 3d, It is further Enacted, that should any citizen or citizens of this Republic be found guilty of contravening the provisions of the first section of this act, by pretending that he, or they are acting as broker, agent, or commission merchant; and thereby cause the spirit and intent of this act to be ineffectual, he or they, thus fraudulently acting, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor,—and on conviction before any court competent to try the same, be fine in any sum not less than one hundred, nor more than five hundred dollars at the discretion of the Court. And further, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six calendar months;—nevertheless, nothing in this section shall be so construed as to interfere with the rights and privileges of a lawful commission merchant, agent or broker.

Sec, 4th, It is further Enacted, that it shall be unlawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, Collector of Customs, Treasurer and Sub-Treasurers, or any other officer engaged in the Revenue service, to act as agent or commission merchant, for any citizen, or other person within this Republic, during the term for which he or they shall have been commissioned, and any officer as above mentioned who shall violate the provisions of this section, on representation made to the Executive shall be dismissed from office.—and further; shall be find in any sum not less than one hundred dollars.—nor more than five hundred dollars, at the discretion of the court having jurisdiction of the same—and that all laws or parts of laws conflicting with the provisions of this act, be and the same are hereby repealed.

Proceedings of the National True LIBERIAN CONVENTION,

HELD IN THE COURT HOUSE MONROVIA

FEBY. 6TH, 1857.

At half past 7 P. M., the Convention was called to order; and the preliminary organization of the meeting entered into. Hon. James B. Mc Gill was invited to the Chair and J. H. Paxton, esq., appointed Secretary. The Chairman on taking his seat spoke as follows:

"Gentlemen I presume there are none present but what know the object of this meeting, and are prepared to act accordingly. I feel grateful for the confidence of the gentlemen in this marked expression of respect in calling me to the Chair Gentlemen as I view the present crisis as interesting and critical as at any period of our history. The present preliminary organization of the Convention will no doubt be superseded by a regular systematic organization, after the Committee on organization shall have reported.

The time has arrived for our exertions in another political campaign: my zeal is unabated, and I feel proud to speak in the defense of those principles of political policy that have proudly brought the country through so many seasons of trial; and which I hope will long continue her bulwark in the hands of sober and discreet rulers. such as those whom I am led to believe will be chosen by this Convention for the election in May ensuing.

President Benson is a man of sterling worth (as well as Vice President Yates,) and who I feel from the evidence he has given of his ability to manage and order the affairs of the government, has demanded our influence and suffrages. I am highly gratified with the privilege of speaking so flatteringly of gentlemen, whom the country know well as men of integrity, and in whom the people can safely confide their liberties, being assured that no circumstance will allure them to compromise their own honor, much less the honor of their County."

On motion a Committee was requested to be appointed by the Chairman, of three members from each settlement, to report officers for a permanent organization of the Convention and to make a selection of a gentleman for the office of President of the Republic, and one for Vice President—for the approval of the Convention, to be the candidates for the biennial election in May ensuing and to ascertain the validity of the credentials of the members. The motion being unanimously carried after some remarkes pertinent to the question by Thomas Travis, esq., the Chairman named the Committee as follows;—

F. Richardson J. S. Calvin. G. W. Flood.	Millsburg.
Thomas Travis, esq. Charles Carter, Henry Rix.	Caldwell.
S. Moton. E. Grayham, J. Roots.	Virginia.
Hon. J. H. Chavers. H. W. Dennis, esq., Lieut. Reed Cooper.	Monrovia.

The Committee then retired to act upon the duties assigned them.

On motion the Convention take recess for half hour.

The time having expired the Convention was called to order.

After some appropriate remarks by several gentlemen, the Committee announced their preparation to report; whereupon the following resolution was offered;

RESOLVED. That the Committee appointed by your honor the Chairman of the Convention to take into consideration the selection of two persons as Candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency of the Republic, for the ensuing biennial election, beg leave to present to the Convention the following Gentlemen. For President, His Excellency STEPHEN A. BENSON—for Vice Preisdent His Hon. BEVERLY P. YATES. The Committee further beg to announce the members properly accredited—and Hon. J. B. McGill President of the Convention and J.H. Paxton Secretary.

The Convention then balloted for the gentlemen who were named in the Committees report, and the tellers announced their election unanimous.

On motion that a Committee be appointed from each Settlement by the Convention, to be charged with the duty of waiting on His Excelency President Benson, and inform him of his nomination to the Presidency by the True Liberian Convention, and of the undiminished confidence they still maintain in his ability to govern to the best interest of the people also to inform Vice President Yates of his nomination to the Vice Presidency; and of the great esteem entertained, for his eminent services in the field and his degnified demeanor, in civil life.

H. W. Dennis esq., Thomas Travis esq., C. Capeheart and T. Richardson, were appointed as that Committee.

After the expiration of an hour or more, the Committee returned and reported.—

That they had waited on his Excellency President Benson, and informed him of his nomination by the True Liberian Convention for the Presidency of this Republic at the ensuing election; he kindly reciprocated their good feeling, and stated that he felt highly gratified at the honor conferred upon him while he was truly sensible of the gratitude due his fellow citizens for so signal manifestation of their approbation of his past political career. He could but reassure them, that his purpose, as formerly avowed, was a faithful adherence to the Constitution—the encouragement of every branch of industry—a zealous effort to forward the national greatness of the Country, by education, agriculture, commerce and mechanism, and such other principles as will arise in order to ensue the Healthy and onward progress of the Government.

The Committee having waited on His Hon. Beverly P. Yates, and informed him also of his nomination to the Vice Presidency at the coming election in May by the True Liberian Convention.

He cordially desired them to accept his many thanks, in the name of the Convention for the confidential respect entertained of him, in holding his name and character in such high public repute. The tenets of the Convention, were in perfect consonace with his feelings and views of the political policy of the Country and the permanent existence of its institutions i. e, to be ever consulting such principles of governmental policy as would enhance the public weal, and doing what is rightly conceived to be just.

On motion of Lieut. R. Cooper, the responses of the gentlemen named were unanimously received.

By vote of the Convention, its doings were ordered to be published.

After thanks to the President of the Convention and other officers. The Convention adjourned.

LIBERIA HERALD.
MONROVIA WEDNESDAY FEBRUARY 4 1857

THE LEGISLATUIE OF THE REPUBLIC OF LIBERIA.

The Legislature of this Republic closed its session which commenced on the first of Dec., on the evening of the 7th inst, 10 P. M. Though a session of more than two months and one two at which matters of great importance were considered and discussed, yet we have never seen more harmony and good feeling manifested on such an occasion than were by that august body during its entire session.

As is reasonable to suppose, there was a difference of opinion among the members on some matters, nor are all their acts unexceptionably to the public; yet as a whole considering the amount of business they dispatched, and taking other circumstances under consideration, every reasonable man must confess that they have acquitted themselves equal to public expectation, and consequently, are entitled to their due meed of praise They gave a very favorable consideration to all the subjects to which their attention was invited in the President's Message.

Before dismussing this subject it may not be amiss for us to remark, that the fact must now be apparent, to every reflecting Liberian, that the magnitude of the business that will claim the attention and action of the successive Legislative bodies of this Republic, will be in proportion to our national age and growth. We should expect its business to grow into increasing importance and as a consequence, will require the most competent men Liberia can produce to honorably and adequately discharge her legislative work so that no obstruction be placed in the way of her future growth, and in order that her reputation be preserved untarnished. Infant Republic as ours is, we have nothing to rely upon for a respectable national existence, but the scrupulously maintaining of an untarnished national reputation; this under Divine direction will be to us a fortress and high tower. The scrupulously persevering in this cause by the enactment of just, liberal laws, and their prompt enforcement awarding equal justice to all and by the calculation of virtue, we shall go on and prosper under the benign smiles of heaven, until we shall attain to the zenith of our national glory.

THE INTERDICT ON THE BLUE BARREE AND BOOTAW COAST.

We inadvertently remarked in our last issue of the Herald, that the aboriginal tribes in Sinoe County still assumed a hostile position toward our settlements in that County, of which nothing would so effectually cure them, as the continuation of the interdict. But from interviews we have subsequently had with inhabitants of that County, as well as with persons who have very recently visited our settlements there. We are happy to say that we have learned that there is no foundation for the charge against those tribes of hostile manifestations towards our settlements; and we take pleasure in correcting that error,—their only delinquency as we learn, and which has caused a continuation of the interdict, is their not having as yet complied with some of the stipulations of indemnification to our government. In fact, the chastisement so reluctantly inflicted on those tribes by our government has been so salutary, as that it is unreasonable, and one must be very much unacquainted with the character of the native Africans on our coast, to suppose that they would so soon prove reckless to their own interest. We earnestly hope that matters in that County—both with respect to the American Liberians and the aborigines will soon assume their wonted uniform course, and that peace and prosperity will permanently abide in that interesting County.

THE LIBERIA HERALD. We beg to call the attention of the citizens to the fact, that the Legislature during its Session made no provision for the continuance of the Herald;—therefore it becomes us to give timely information that those who may desire its continued publication, may be able to contribute to its interest. A newspaper is a vehicle held in high repute in every intelligent community;—and we fully believe that there is patriotism enough in Liberia to continue the Hearld if the matter is made known; and we doubt not but what our friends abroad would rather contribute something towards the support of the Herald than to have it discontinued. It is the only periodical in the State,—the only nucleus through which our existence as a civilized and christian people, desiring to be enlightened is known. We trust our appeal will meet with the sympathetic consideration of the friends of the Herald in general.

EMBARKATION OF TROOPS FOR CAPE PALMAS.

On the morning of February 11 at 9 A., M., the Johnson Guards and a detachment of the Militia of Montserrado County under the Command of J. J Roberts late President of this Republic, embarked in the American Ship M. C. Stevens, W. B. Daniels master for Harper in the State of Maryland in Liberia for the purpose of assisting the Infant Colony in its present critical position. We trust that victory will crown their exertions—that tranquility will ere long be restored, and that arrangements will be made so as to terminate the war that has recently ruined, not only many citizens, but materially injured the prospects of that young State. The alacrity demonstrated by Liberia's sons on this occasion fully proves their sympathy for their fellow men—how can it be otherwise? are we not brethren?

We learn that the former Governor of the prementioned Colony, Dr James Hall accompanied the expedition and showed an interest well worthy of a christian,

AN EXTRAORDINARY QUICK PASSAGE.—The brig Tweedside of London, W. Pannell master, arrived at this port the 17th inst; having left London the 27th of last month. Extraordinary circumstances took place after the arrival of the said brig which have placed the character of her master in no very favorable light, however we trust that after due investigation of the said circumstances, the government will be fully satisfied

THE MARY CAROLINE STEVENS. This splendid vessel, the product of the benificence of the late John Stevens Esqr, of Talbot County Maryland U. S. A arrived in our harbour on the 24th ult with 290 immigrants. Dr. James Hall (formerly Gov. of Cape Palmas Colony) and daughter came passengers in her. We learn that a number of the immigrants were landed at Roberts Port Grand Cape Mount, at which place the vessel stopped before reaching this port; up to the present date there have been but little complaint among the immigrants of sickness. Those who have been sent to Careysburg, (the interior settlement) under the supervision of the Rev. John Seys have had no symptoms of fever whatever. In our next issue we shall be more able to furnish our readers with information as to the salubrity of the locality.

ENGLISH LIBERTY.

We love
Th e king who loves the law, respects his bounds
And reigns content within them; him we serve
Freely, and with delight, who leaves us free:
But recollecting still that he is man,
We trust him not too far. King though he be,
And king in England too, he may be weak,
And vain enough to be ambitious still;
May exercise amiss his proper powers,
Or covet more than freemen choose to grant:
Beyond that mark is treason. He is ours
To administer, to guard, to adorn the state,
But not to wrap or change it. We are his
To serve him nobly in the common cause,
True to the death, but not to be his slaves.
Mark now the difference, ye that boast your love
Of kings, between your loyalty and ours!
We love the man, the paltry pageant you;
We the chief patron of the commonwealth,
You the regardless author of its woes;
We, for the sake of liberty, a king,
You chains and bondage for a tyrant's sake:
Our love is principle, and has its root
In reason—is judicious, manly, free:
Yours, a blind instinct, crouches to the rod,
And licks the foot that treads it in the dust.
Were kingship as true treasure as it seems,
Sterling, and worthy of a wise man's wish,
I would not be a king to be beloved
Causeless, and daubed with undiscerning praise,
Where love is mere attachment to the throne,
Not to the man who fills it as he ought.
'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume;
And we are weeds without it. All constraint,
Except what wisdom lays on evil men,
Is evil; hurts the faculties, impedes
Their progress in the road of science, blinds
The eyesight of discovery, and begets
In those that suffer it a sordid mind,
Bestial, a meagre intellect, unfit
To be the tenant of man's noble form.
Thee therefore still, blameworthy as thou art,
With all thy loss of empire, and though squezed
By public exigence till annual food
Fails for the craving hunger of the state,
Thee I account still happy, and the chief
Among the nations, seeing thou art free.
My native nook of earth! thy clime is rude,
Replete with vapours, and disposes much
All hearts to sadness, and none more than mine:
Thine unadulterate manners are less soft
And plausible than social life requires;
And thou hast need of discipline and art
To give thee what politer France receives
From nature's bounty—that humane address
And sweetness, without which no pleasure is
In converse, either starved by cold reserve,
Or flushed with fierce dispute, a senseless brawl:
Yet, being free, I love thee: for the sake
Of that one feature can be well content,
Disgraced as thou hast been, poor as thou art,
To seek no sublunary rest beside.
But once enslaved, farewell! I could endure
Chains nowhere patiently; and chains at home,
Where I am free by birthright, not at all.

SLAVE-TRADE OPERATIONS.

From the Sierra-Leone New Era for January.

At Sierra Leone there are Mixed Courts of Justice for the adjudication of suspected vessels bearing the flags of nations who have entered into treaties with Great Britain for the suppression of the slave-trade, and a Vice Admiralty Court for the adjudication of such vessels as are without evidence of nationality. In the Mixed Courts no case had been adjudicated upon during the year 1855, with the exception of one vessel, which was liberated. In the Vice-Admiralty Court, a prize to the "Ferret," taken in the Rio Pongus, fully equipped for the slave trade, was condemned and broken up, besides several native canoes with slaves on board, captured in their transit from the Sherbro to the Susu country. "The total number of cases prosecuted before the Mixed Commissions since their establishment at Sierra Leone in June 1819 up to the end of December 1855, is 531, whereof 503 were cases of condemnation." In the same period there have been emancipated by these Mixed Courts 64,615 slaves, of whom 56,95 have been registered at Sierra Leone. During the year 1855 no slaves were emancipated or registered. We should, however, err very much in judgment if we therefore concluded that the action of the slave trade had ceased on this portion of the coast, and that there are no slave ships engaged in bearing their human freightage across the wide Atlantic, either to die on the passage or live as slaves. The slave ships have been numerous, but they have escaped our cruisers, not from want of vigilance, but from their numerical inadequacy to the surveillance of so extensive a coast. The fact is undoubted, that, in consequence of the reduced strength of the British squadron, the exportation of slaves during the year 1854 was greatly increased. We fear that the slave dealers have not been less successful in the year 1855; and we think that this is capable of demonstration. Cuba is, at the present moment, the only certain market for African slaves tran-shipped across the Atlantic. From whatever points along the extended coast of West Africa the lines of slave traffic may be drawn, they all converge to Cuba as a common centre. If, then, we are enabled to show that there has been large arrivals of slaves in Cuba, there must have been corresponding transhipments from the African coast, although they escaped, a very few instances excepted, the vigilance of our cruisers. That there has been such an increase of slaves in the island of Cuba cannot be disputed. According to official statistics, the number of slaves imported into that island during the year 1854 amounted, at the lowest computation, to 7673; and if the usual addition of one third be made for unreported landings, the total estimate for that year will be 10,239: a number not indeed so large as that of 1853, but larger than the number of those imported in any one of the eleven years immediately preceding the year 1853, and exceeding the average of importations during the last fifteen years by 4034. The year 1855 appears, from the despatches of our agents, to have been of similar activity. We find, indeed, a statement from Her Majesty's Acting Commissary Judge at the Havana, dated Jan. 14, 1856, to the effect, that, during the year 1855, 4806 Bozals were got on shore at various places, of which 125 were captured, making, with an addition of one third for the unreported, a total of 6408 introduced during the preceding twelve months. We fear that the above sum must be viewed as a very low computation. We are disposed to this conclusion from the increased facilities afforded to the slave dealers. It has been no longer necessary that the expeditions to the coast of Africa should proceed, as formerly, from Cuba. The required vessels have been found in the United States, "where the craft employed are to be met with, cheap and suitable, as well as their fittings and stores much more reasonable in price than in Cuba; added to which they are subjected to less observation, and run less risk of detection; the masters and crews being easily found to proceed under the direction of an agent or supercargo—usually experienced slave dealers—their cargoes being ready waiting their appearance at the given point of embarkation: they arrive there under the American flag, take on board their miserable cargo, and are off so very quickly from the coast that they would be found, like the "Grey Eagle," without papers of any kind, should there be evidence on board of their slaving character."

'Such slaves generally, however, escape capture on the coast of Africa, and they arrive at some place on that of Cuba, where advice is waiting them as to the point of landing their cargoes. The parties here who are interested in the mean time have made their arrangements, and the slaves are introduced safely and with impunity."*

On reading these extracts we cannot discern any grounds for concluding that the slave importations for 1855 have been less than those of the preceding year; but, on the contrary, much to sustain the probability of their having considerably increased. In fact, when we take into consideration the systematic organization which now prevails, the swift sailing and well found vessels employed, the experience of the crews, the connivance of the Spanish subordinates, the eagerness of Cuba for an increase of the labour element, and the extent of Cuban coast, affording, as it does, various points of landing from whence a selection may be made, it is impossible even to conjecture the actual amount of importation; nor is it at all beyond the range of probability that it may have doubled that of the preceding year. The Spanish authorities find it possible to adopt such measures as are affective to prevent the landing of slaves. "All the slaves that are brought to the coast of Cuba continue to be landed." Such is the testimony of Mr. Consul General Crawford, under date October 3. 1855; and therefore, with facilities of obtaining negroes on the African coast through the weakness of our squadron, and of landing them on the Cuban coast, without hindrance or even difficulty, and with American vessels at their disposal to act as carriers, we may be assured that the slave dealers have not failed to prosecute their infamous vocation throughout the year 1855 with all activity. In fact so flagrant have these proceedings been, that they have been made the subject of special remonstrance to the Spanish Government through our Ambassador at the Court of Madrid, Lord Clarendon, in a despatch dated December 21 1855 citing the following facts as demonstrative of the unchecked importation of slaves into Cuba "namely, that the number of slaves employed upon the estates of Cuba have been kept up; that many new sugar plantations have been formed, and supplied with African labourers; and that, upon the whole, the boasted activity and vigilance of General Concha have failed remarkably in producing any beneficial effect toward the suppression of the slave trade."

The masses thus imported into Cuba have been deported from Africa, and the slave trade, at various points along the coast of that continent, must have been intensely active. True the slave vessels captured during the year 1855 have been few indeed. During the previous year—1854 there were captured and condemned no fewer than seven vessels engaged in the slave trade, six of them with slaves on board; but during the year 1855, besides the native canoes already mentioned, there have been captured one brig in the Rio *P*ongas, and a small cutter rigged vessels without name, flag, or papers, with a crew of five persons, and having ninety slaves on board, from the Congo bound to St. Thomas, destroyed by H. M. S. "*P*lumper" as unfit for a sea voyage. But that slave ships have been numerous on the coast may be collected from the despatches sf our agents. When Commodore Adams was cruising off the Bissagos or Bejuga islands, in the early part of 1855, it was reported to him that two *P*ortuguese vessels had succeeded in escaping with cargoes of slaves.

The Rio *P*ongas keeps up its reputation for the slave trade, and despatches from Sierra Leone bearing date January 12, 1855, state, that at that time a cargo of Africans was collected there ready for shipment, and only waiting for a vessel to convey them away. One of Her Majesty's cruisers was constantly stationed at that point of the coast, and of the nine vessels captured in 1854 and 1855, two had been in the Rio Pongas. No doubt an equally effective surveillance at other suspected points would have been followed by similar results. Towards the end of 1855, an American schooner, the "Alexander Mitchell," after calling at Monrovia with a cargo of American produce, is said to have shipped and carried off upwards of 309 negroes from between Cape Palmas and the Bights. Another schooner, from Havana, flying Spanish colours, Don Domingo Mustich, a well known slave dealer, master, had been seen in September 1855, off Sinou, a port of entry in the republic of Liberia, the master coming on shore and making inquiries after slaves. In the following November, a brigantine of suspicious appearance, her copper being painted white, her bulwarks black with a red streak, and having a greater number of hands than is usual, was seen of the Liberian coast. If we look into the Bights similar traces are apparent. On January 2d of the present year, Her Majesty's steamship "Hecate," being off Appii Vista, in the Bight of Benin, chased a suspicious vessel, which, not being able to escape, was run on shore, and totally destroyed. She was found fully equipped to receive slaves. A board had been nailed over that part of the stern on which the name is usually placed. On this being withdrawn, the vessel's name was apparent—the "Chatsworth," of New York Consul Campbell—Lagos—under date of February 1, 1856, reports the arrival of Don Domingo Mustich at Whydah, and the active renewal of the slave trade at that and the neighbouring ports, and of the three vessels forming his expedition having got away with a cargo of slaves. Two other vessels under the American flag were at that time hovering about the slave ports, preparing to take away slaves should the opportunity occur. Several slaves had effected their escape from the barracoons of various slave dealers, but on their flight to Lagos were unhappily intercepted by the natives and retained as slaves, or sold. Only twelve of the number having succeeded in reaching Lagos, were liberated by King Docomo, on the interposition of the consul: they were earning an honest livelihood. We regret to say that slaves are not wanting to furnish cargoes for the slave ships. During the course of 1855 the people of Ibadan invaded a country called Efon, near the Niger; and, after meeting with considerable resistance, succeeded in sweeping off the whole population of the district, to the number, it is said, of 10,000. They returned to Ibadan in September last, bringing with them a number of these unfortunate captives. Finding no purchaser for them in the Ijebu markets, the port of Lagos being now closed to all slave trading operations, they forwarded them to Whydah. One of our Missionaries, the Rev. J. A. Maser, journeying from Abbeokuta to Ibadan in April last, met some of these poor sufferers, slave boys of about the age of fourteen years, belonging to the Efon tribe, who were being driven down to the coast for sale. It is to be feared that in Mustich and his compeers they found ready purchasers, and that, like Dasalu, they have been shipped on board of the many slave ships which have been lurking about on that part of the coast.

We learn from Her Majesty's Consul at Fernando *P*o, that to the southward of Corisco the *P*ortuguese and Spaniards are prosecuting the trade in canoes and boats, the slaves being thus transferred, by small instalments, to Prince's and St. Thomas's islands, from which many of them are said to be transported to the Havana.

On the *P*ortuguese portion of the coast, looking further south, an American schooner carried off, in the end of March 1855 from a spot called Quicongo, in the neighbourhood of Black Point, 350 slaves, destined for Cuba. Such are the hopes entertained of an active revival of the slave trade on that part of the coast, that a notorious slave dealer, Francisco Jose de Rosa, had clandestinely left Rio de Janeiro for Loanda, by way of Mossamedas and Benguela. The Brazilian Government, convinced, from the known character of the man, that he had slave trading transactions in view, communicated this information to the British authorities, through our Ambassador at Lisbon.

We may not terminate, this review of slave trading operations on the coast of Africa without reference to certain proceedings in the Sherbro river. The Susu and Mandingo slave-dealers prosecute an active trade in the Sherbro and the adjacent districts, resorting thither in very considerable numbers, and establishing such a system of terrorism, that British subjects, trading in the same neighbourhoods, are afraid to have any communication with the British Consul, lest they should be suspected of giving him information as to what was going forward. Thus, in these waters, there is carried on a very active canoe-transport traffic, slaves continued to be transported almost daily from the Kittam, Gallinas, and Boom countries, to places north of the Sierra Leone colony. As might be expected, slave ships hover on this part of the coast, and, no doubt, occasionally succeed in shipping cargoes; but the greatest portion of the slaves are transported by canoes to the northward, where they can be shipped in more security. This traffic appears to be so much on the increase, that "whereas formerly the canoes engaged in it usually commenced to come into the southern waters about the end of March and the beginning of April, after the previous year's cargoes had been conveyed away, now, very considerable numbers are reported to be coming in before the old companies have left." It would be a great misapprehension of the character of this trade to suppose that it is merely for domestic purposes. It is "as really and certainly for purposes of traffic and gain as the transoceanic trade, and in its results, equally calculated to chattelize man and to infringe every right of humanity." We are glad to find that several of these canoes have been captured within the British waters—two canoes in December last, about two miles from the Banana islands, with eighty-six slaves on board; and three others on the 14th of January of the present year, in Sierra Leone river, about twenty miles from Freetown. No fewer than 119 persons, men, women, boys, and girls, were found packed together in the bottom of the canoes, as is always the case, in a very confined space, and enduring the torture of a constrained and painful position.

* * * * * * *

It is evident that a very active trade is being prosecuted by the Swaheli and Arab subjects of the Imam of Muscat; that the Turkish branch on the north coast is in more than usual activity; and that the same may be affirmed of West African exportation. We are quite aware that the statements of the naval officers in command on the West-African coast are of an opposite character. Commodore Adams, under date of September 26th, 1855, reports that "what little traffic in slaves still continues to exist on this coast is chiefly carried on in American bottoms.' We fear that the American go-betweens find opportunity for much more than a "little traffic;" but the insufficiency of the blockading force accounts for the discrepency. All the squadrons for the suppression of the slave-trade were diminished on the commencement of the Russian war: the French one dwindled down to a very small number, and our own was greatly reduced. We are informed that they have been reinforced: we should be glad to know whether it be sufficiently so for the exigencies of Africa.

Is the blockading system to be abandoned or otherwise? Some, who unite with us in abhorence of the slave-trade, pronounce very confidently on the utter uselessness of such a mode of proceeding. The Anti-Slavery Report concludes this to be the case, from the feebleness of the results which have been produced, the number of vessels captured averaging not more than twenty a year. Now, before we pronounce on the abortiveness of the system, it would be prudent, in the first instance, to decide as to what we are justified in expecting from it. What was it intended to do? Let that point be first decided. It is not just to condemn an instrumentality because it has not answered extravagant expectations. We never dreamed that the squadron would be extirpative in its results, but we believed that, if duly sustained, it would so far repress the intensity of slave trade proceedings, as to afford opportunity for the really curative agencies to come into action. What are these? Some would reply, Legitimate commerce.
